CONGRESSIONAL RECORD,

SIXTY-SECOND CONGRESS, FIRST SESSION.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, May 6, 1911.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal God, our heavenly Father, our hearts go out in gratitude to Thee for this glorious spring day, token of Thy presence and continued care. Bring us, we beseech Thee, within the scope of Thy holy influence, that our thoughts may harmonize with Thy thoughts and our hearts beat in unison with Thy great loving heart, that our work may be in consonance with the eternal fitness of things, and so redound to the good of our fellow men. In the spirit of the Lord, Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

THE TARIFF.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 4413, to place agricultural implements and other articles on the free list.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 4413.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. FIELDS].

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, I trust I shall not worry the patience of the distinguished leader of the minority [Mr. MANN] with the few extemporary remarks that I shall make in the short space of time that has been allotted to me. It seems that he has been greatly wearied in the last few days by the new Members on this side of the Chamber. A few days ago he attacked the new Members on this side and stamped upon us the brand of ignorance. I, with many others, accepted his remarks as an insult, and believed that he would have the moral courage to apologize for it. But after careful consideration, Mr. Chairman, I have come to the conclusion that it is the presence and not the conduct, the strength and not the weakness, of the new Members of this side that is troubling the waters for the senior Member on that side.

It is the presence of the new Members on this side that made it possible to elect Hon. CHAMP CLARK Speaker; it is their presence that enabled this side to overthrow the machine of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] that had been manipulated in the interest of the monopolies of this country for so many years. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

It is the presence of the new Members on this side that makes it possible to enact Democratic measures into law, so far as this House is concerned, and to fulfill the Democratic promises made to the people in the last campaign.

Mr. Chairman, I come from a district that is probably more divided in its industries than any other district represented in this Congress. I represent a district composed of 13 counties, 7 of which are in the fertile blue-grass regions of Kentucky, where agriculture is the principal industry, with the other 6 lying in the mountainous section where the mineral wealth is untold, and one of the latter being noted for its iron and lumbering industries.

Mr. Chairman, if I were guided by personal feelings, I might oppose some features of this bill, but I am not here for the personal interests of myself or any other man. I am here in the interest of my constituents, my State as a whole, and my country at large. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The best friends that I have in this world, aside from my immediate family, are the largest manufacturers of lumber in Kentucky, and it is urged from that side of the Chamber that this bill will lead to the destruction of the lumbering industries of our country. I dispute that statement. I realize that it will make lumber a trifle cheaper and lighten the burdens of those who consume it, who are largely in the majority in my district, as well as the country at large, and I am here in the interest of the whole people and not a few people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

For every manufacturer of lumber in my district there are hundreds of builders of homes and thousands of farmers who need to buy lumber every year for consumption on their farms, and I would be unfaithful to the great trust they have confided in me if I failed to voice their sentiments and protect their interests on this floor.

Mr. Chairman, we have heard a great deal during this debate about the farmer and the benefits that this bill will bring to him. I am glad to hear that; I am a farmer myself. I live in a country home and am proud of it. Every dollar that I have in this world is invested in farming lands in Kentucky, and whatever brings prosperity to the farmers of the West, the East, the North, and the South will likewise bring it to the farmers of Kentucky and myself as well. I am in sympathy with the farmer and guard his interests with jealous care. But, while that is true, there is another class that must not be forgotten or neglected, but considered first in all legislation. I speak, Mr. Chairman, "of the toiling millions who constitute the bone and sinews of this Government in time of peace and stand as its bulwark of protection in time of war," who earn their living by the sweat of their brow and support their families by their daily wage. I know their needs and hardships, and to them my heart returns. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I consider, Mr. Chairman, that the laborer will derive the greatest benefits and reap the greatest harvest from this bill, because he buys every dollar's worth of food that he and his family consumes, while the farmer raises the greater portion of it on his farm, and food and clothing are the first and main necessaries for which the laborer must provide, and he is hardly able to provide that under the existing high prices that have been forced upon him by the cruel and merciless hand of organized wealth.

Mr. Chairman, I trust that I may not be misunderstood when I refer to organized wealth. I am not a fanatic, and I detest fanaticism. I do not place the stamp of greed upon every man who possesses wealth, or oppose him because he is wealthy. As a representative, in part, of this great industrial Nation, I realize that it is my plain duty to guard and protect the legitimate business interests of this country. And by doing this I do not antagonize the farmer and laborer, for these three great elements are dependent upon each other and their interests are mutual. The three go hand in hand, and the man who would strike a blow at either would perpetrate an injustice against all.

But, Mr. Chairman, I do condemn the great gigantic trusts of this country that were born into existence through Republican legislation and have become so strong, so powerful, and so full of greed that they are dismantling and crushing out of existence the independent manufactories of the land and placing through unjust tariff taxation the yoke of oppression on the neck of labor. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Another man, or another class, who will derive great benefit from this bill is the merchant. That may sound strange to some, but, Mr. Chairman, I know from whence I speak. I was for a number of years a commercial traveler, and I am proud that I have the honor to be identified with that great body of business men who represent the great commercial interests of this country. Our honorable Speaker [Mr. CLARK], in a speech last winter, referred to the commercial travelers as the torchlights of information. I do not take that view of it, but I class them as the reach, the kingbolt, and, in fact, the running gear of the great carriage of commerce. They keep the wheels of business rolling, and by competition within their own ranks bring lower prices for the consumer when not hindered by the trusts. So, in that line of business, I have had an opportunity to see and understand what the merchants of this country were confronted with by reason of the high prices and the rules of the trusts that manufacture the products that they sell daily.

It has been almost impossible for them to make a legitimate profit on their merchandise, because of the continual advancing prices and the unsettled condition of trade. And, another thing, if they care to deviate from the prices fixed by the trust they are put on the black list, and the supply of the product is discontinued to them, and by this rule their hands are absolutely tied, and they must bow to the dominant will of the great monopolies. So, it is apparent that by placing on the free list the articles mentioned in this bill, the merchant will be benefited as well as the consumer.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to draw just a little picture of the grand old Republican Party that we have heard so much of. But I want to say in advance that I would not apply this picture to the entire Republican Party, for the rank and file of the Republican Party, like the rank and file of all other parties, is honest and sincere. But that element of that party, Mr. Chairman, has been deceived, misled, and misused by their leaders, to whom this picture does so fittingly apply. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The Republican Party, Mr. Chairman, joined in wedlock about 16 years ago with Miss Money. The rights of marriage were solemnized by the then distinguished Dingley; and, Mr. Chairman, they were not bidden by their uniter, as were the first couple that were ever joined in wedlock, to go forth and multiply and replenish the earth, but they received the promise that they should in time to come own and control the wealth of the world. They took up their abode in the National Capitol and were prosperous and happy. But, unfortunately for the American people, there was never a legitimate heir born to this union. [Applause on the Democratic side.] But they created three artificial sons, and by legislative manipulation breathed into them the spirit of life. They named one of them Andrew, another one John P., and another one John D. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

And they, like most adopted children, have been running their parents ever since. Father Republican directed his companion to go out in the fields of industry and take care of his sons, and said, "I will remain in the National Capital and see that measures are enacted into law that will enable our sons to do whatsoever they will, and accomplish whatever they wish in the business affairs of the land. Go build factories, and I will enact laws that will enable them to collect from the American consumer a double, yea, a treble, profit on their manufactured products, by placing upon the statute books a tariff law that will restrict foreign competition. Go purchase for a trifle the hidden mineral wealth that lies in the bowels of the earth, and I will give you tariff protection that will make it worth untold millions; go develop the oil fields, and I will make the tariff duty so high on oil that foreign oil will never strike a blaze in this tariff-protected land of ours." And, Mr. Chairman, when Father Republican saw how well oil had worked, he decided to try water for a project, and he put John P. to building railroads on water stock. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

And, Mr. Chairman, he did not stop there. He enacted laws that enabled them to go into the great undeveloped West and grab the great public domain that should have been reserved for our homeless. Nor did he stop there. He enacted laws that enabled them to seize the great water-power sites of the West, which enabled them to fasten their monopolistic grip on the farming sections of the arid lands. Ah, Mr. Chairman, nor did he stop there. Old Glory was hardly unfurled under Alaska's skies until he made provisions for them to seize and monopolize the coal that lies beneath Alaska's soil. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, the work of building this monopolistic structure was not done by guess. Every corner stone and every piece of material contained in it was cut and laid by a blueprint drawn by a Republican architect, and the workmen who built it were put through rigid examination before they were employed, and no man was permitted to even act as hod carrier who was not an admirer of the plan.

These examinations were held, Mr. Chairman, in the political fields. When a man of the Republican Party expressed his desire to go to the National Congress he was interviewed right away by a special agent who was a member of the building committee, and if this aspirant was not in full sympathy with the plans of the structure he was then and there "canned" and laid on the shelf, regardless of his efficiency or his nobleness of character or love for the American people. When the Democrats made their nominations the agents were likewise sent to the Democratic candidates, and if they seemed inclined to antagonize this monopolistic work, that was so rapidly progressing, a sufficient amount of the money that these monsters had wrung from the pockets of the American people by tariff taxation was poured into his district to secure his defeat. And by this practice, Mr. Chairman, they kept in the National Congress a sufficient number of Senators and Representatives who were in sympathy with their plans to keep them moving on. That has been done repeatedly, and we know it.

Another asset they had was the old soldiers. They went into the East, the North, and the West and appealed to the soldiers to stand by them, saying, "You receive your pensions from us and must rally to our support." When congressional campaigns came every pensioner was expected to fall in line, and so he did. But after awhile, Mr. Chairman, the pensioners, the men who took up their muskets and left home and loved ones and went forward to offer their bodies as targets and their lives as sacrifices on the battle field that the Union might not be dissolved discovered that there were discriminations between them. They began to investigate and found that the men who had served for four long years in the Civil War, who had done service for their country and honor to themselves, were not, in many instances, receiving as much money as those who had served from 90 days to 6 months, who probably never shouldered a musket or saw actual service. They began to ask themselves the question how it had occurred and began to discover the reason.

The reason, Mr. Chairman, was that these fortunate creatures were better politicians than they themselves. And the Representative came to Congress indebted to these politicians and gave special attention to their claims, and I say—and it can not be disputed—that the men who are receiving the most liberal pensions to-day are the soldiers who are the best politicians, and not the men who endured the most hardships, who braved the greatest dangers, and did the most for their country or fought the hardest for their country's rights. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Another great asset upon which they have relied is the colored vote. They seek to arouse the passion of the colored voter by reminding him of the days of slavery. They say to him, "We are the gods of liberty, through us your freedom came," and at the same time reestablishing slavery among the white people of the world by advocating and conducting white-slave trade by importing white-pauper laborers from Europe and subjecting them to a most deplorable condition of slavery by placing them in guarded factories and mines at a less wage than the American laborer can subsist on. Instead of making him an American citizen they make him an American slave, and place him in competition to the American labor, even the colored laborer of the South, for the purpose of increasing the fortunes of some of the most gigantic trusts of this country.

These schemes have been popular, but they are getting old. The people have begun to awaken, and the time is coming when they can no longer be controlled by fairy tales.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, the people all over the country, everywhere, have heard of the good things that were to come. The laboring men, who had heard the slogan of the "full dinner pail" for many years, began to realize that it was harder for them to pay their grocery bills than ever before, and began to wonder where the trouble was. They began to read for themselves, they began to think for themselves, and began to find, Mr. Chairman, that the wealth of the country was being concentrated into the hands of a few by the machine of the Republican Party, or the laws which that machine had placed upon the statute books.

Mr. Chairman, I love the American people for their honesty, loyalty, and independence. They are firm in their convictions. They are loyal to their friends, and so long as the Republican Party had them believing that it was the friend of the laboring man, the toiling masses stood shoulder to shoulder with that party in political warfare, but, Mr. Chairman, when they began to realize that they had been deceived, when they began to realize that the protective-tariff system was protecting the classes and oppressing the masses—and this fact dawned upon them in 1910—they raised up in their might and demanded their rights at the polls on November 8th and commissioned us to do the work in which we are now engaged and will soon complete. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, we have heard it said on that side of the House that this free-list bill would not become a law. I want to say to the gentlemen that it will become a law. It will pass this House, and if defeated in a Republican Senate or vetoed by a Republican President it will again come before a Democratic House in 1913, be passed by a Democratic Senate, and signed by a Democratic President. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, I want to say in conclusion that the stories the Republican Party has been telling the people, for lo! these many years, have become stale and will no longer endure, and the still, small voice of justice that spoke the principles of Democracy into existence so long ago is to-day appealing to the men of this Republic to rise up in a spirit of true and independent citizenship and restore to the hands of the people the reins of this Government, where they so justly belong. The sovereign will of justice has decreed that the wig of lamb's wool shall be lifted from the head of the wolf—this tariff machine—and the yoke of oppression from the neck of labor. [Prolonged applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER].

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Chairman, at the very commencement of my remarks I want to deny the assertion which has been made on the Republican side of this Chamber that the pending free-list bill is a compensatory measure given to the farmers to compensate them for the Canadian reciprocity agreement, which passed the House about two weeks ago. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

There is absolutely nothing in that contention. There is not an article upon this free-list bill which is not the fulfillment of a Democratic pledge made to the people for the last 10 years. We promised them on the stump, on the platform, on the floor of this House, and in our campaign book, long before we ever dreamed that there was going to be any legislation on a Canadian reciprocity agreement, that we would put agricultural implements, meat products, cotton bagging and ties, and other products and articles in the pending bill upon the free list. This same, this identical bill would, at the first opportunity, have been presented by the Democratic Party to the consideration of this House whether we had had any Canadian reciprocity legislation or not. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The passage of this bill will be a fulfillment of another Democratic promise. It is in no way a measure to compensate the farmer for the reciprocity agreement, which we contend is absolutely no detriment to him, but, on the contrary, a benefit, for every Democrat believes that a tariff on agricultural products is a sham and a pretense.

I have been amused during the long debate on Canadian reciprocity and the pending free-list bill to find that only one Member on the Republican side has had the boldness to defend the Payne-Aldrich bill. The distinguished ex-Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], says that he agrees with the President of the United States that it was the greatest tariff bill ever enacted, but I find that no other Member on that side has the boldness or the temerity to make such an assertion. Those who two years ago were so enthusiastic in support of that measure are now as silent as the grave, and are unwilling to commit themselves by saying one word of praise in its behalf. I trust that this presages the coming of a better day, the abandoning by the Republican Party of the doctrines and principles of protection. I believe, Mr. Chairman, that the great masses of the American people have become dissatisfied with these principles; that they are tired of a system of taxation which keeps one hundred men poor to make one man enormously rich.

Using the Federal power of taxation in levying tariff duties as a pretext for the collection of revenue and the upbuilding of infant industries, and this power early leaning to privilege and favoritism, it has encouraged a protective-tariff system, which, expanding beyond the fondest hopes of its advocates, now stifles all competition and has promoted the development and growth of gigantic trusts and combines, the method and magnitude of whose operations are causing uneasiness and concern to all thoughtful minds. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Protection is the legitimate offspring of favoritism and privilege. It means a corrupted and coerced ballot. It means an endless train of perpetual lobbyists. It is a harbinger of woe and want and misery and dissatisfaction. [Applause on the Democratic side.] It gives bounties to its favorites and extends subsidies to the few at the expense of the many. It has driven the American flag from the face of the seas. As John G. Carlisle once said, "It puts the Government into partnership with certain classes of its citizens, and while it compels others to furnish the capital, allows its favorites to receive all the profits." It levels legislation to the dignity of a bargain counter, for if one protectionist is given a tax on an article he makes to benefit his private business, he is more than willing in return to make all the people contribute a tax and a subsidy to insure any other protectionist's private business a profit. It leads to the worst form of governmental extravagance by its insidious and indirect method of plundering the people. It means the development and growth of gigantic trusts, for having stifled all competition by prohibitive and outrageous tariff rates, a complete monopoly on all articles of consumption and manufacture is assured. It means giving one man permission to thrust his hand into another man's pockets and, forcibly taking from him the product of his sweat and his toil, convert it to his own use without the fear of the criminal law. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Protection leads to aristocracy, as rude an aristocracy as sprang up in ancient days, when superiority of brain and brawn brought about caste and caste brought about privilege. In the days of the Grachii, this aristocracy of wealth and power, arrogant and oppressive, owned all the land and worked it with slaves, forcing the people away from the farms to the cities and the highways. To-day, over 2,000 years after the Grachii laid down their lives in defense of civil liberty, to-day, by favored legislation, we find that a few tariff-swollen industries, like the aristocracy of old, are cornering the wealth and property of the world. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Those who believe in this aristocracy of wealth and power find their American authority in Alexander Hamilton, the god of Republican idolatry and the source of all their inspiration. You gentlemen will doubtless remember that a week or two ago, when two resolutions were sent in from the Senate, one appropriating $100,000 for a monument to Jefferson and one appropriating $100,000 for a monument to Hamilton, that when the name of Thomas Jefferson, the author of the Declaration of Independence, the great commoner, the defender and palladium of the people's rights was mentioned, not a word of approval was heard upon that side of the Chamber, but when the name of Alexander Hamilton, the defender of privilege, the champion of caste, the exponent of a centralized form of government, who would have made of the infant Republic a monarchy without a throne, and placed in charge of its destinies a king without a scepter, when his name was mentioned, upon that side of the House there rang tumultuous and deafening and approving applause. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

This great exponent of a centralized form of government once said, "Society divides itself into two political divisions, the few and the many, who have distinct interests. The aristocracy ought to be entirely separate. Their power should be permanent," continued this champion of caste, "and they should have the caritas liberorum."

He believed, as many protectionists believe to-day, that the aristocracy, the recipients of special legislation, who by means of these governmental privileges have raised themselves above their fellows, that this aristocracy of wealth and power alone are competent to legislate and think for the rest of mankind. Despite the applause which rang so loud upon that side of the Chamber, it is a consoling thought that nowhere among the great masses of the people—the people whom Hamilton was afraid to trust—it is a consoling thought that nowhere among them do we find his ardent disciples. The man who wants a privilege, the man who represents the great interests, the man who reaches out for favored legislation and seeks special protection is the man who invokes the spirit of the dead Federalist. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Protection means a hardship to American labor, for it enormously raises the price of everything he eats and wears, while the tax on raw materials keeps out importations. If this tax were removed, there would be cheaper raw products and more material to go into finished articles, which would bring a lessened cost to the consumer and greater prosperity to all. The large increase of the amount of raw material put into manufactured articles would give increased employment to thousands now idle but vainly seeking work at the factories. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The protectionist tells us that by reason of protection he will give higher wages to the workingman. Ah, my friends, primitive man, sleeping in dens and caves, living on raw and uncooked food, starting in trembling dread at every sound, desperately matching his cunning against the cunning of the beast, fought for his food and the preservation of his life. But now, after centuries of civilization, now walled up in a great factory, shut out from the light of day, filling his lungs with dust and ashes, toiling and sweating 12 hours out of the 24, yielding his blood, his muscle, and often his life to the rapacious greed of the manufacturing trusts, the workingman employed by these trusts is looking in vain for an increased wage by reason of increased protection. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The legislation of Solon, 600 years before the birth of Christ, repealed the cruel and unnatural law, where a man, unable to meet his obligations, became the slave of his creditor; but there is no modern Solon, who has set free the thousands of industrial slaves working in the manufactories of Pittsburg and other cherished homes of protection in the United States. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The protectionist tells us that by reason of the increased profit he wrings from all the people by tariff taxation he is enabled to give better wages to the workingman. Of course he is able to, but will he do it? The tariff-protected owner of a great factory is able to pay $20 a barrel for his flour and $1 a pound for his meat, but does he do it? He pays the regular market price for his flour and his meat; the same market price that the man working in his factory from dawn until dark pays for his flour and his meat.

Of course he is able to pay better wages to his workingmen, but he will not do it, and, in proof of what I say, I am reliably informed that over 75 per cent of the laboring men employed in the great manufacturing cities of Providence and Pittsburg, favored homes of protection in the United States, that over 75 per cent of this labor are foreigners, many of whom can neither read, write, nor speak the English language, and are thus employed because they can be secured cheaper and at lower wages than American labor. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I do not believe that the wages of the American workingmen are higher than those abroad. They may look more in dollars and cents, but our labor is the most efficient in the world. By reason of the skill of American labor and the improved machinery of the manufacturer, our labor can produce considerably more in a given time than the labor of other countries. I have heard it stated several times upon the floor of this House that our labor can perform three times as much in a given time as the labor of other countries. And suppose he does get a few cents more in actual wages, why, by reason of outrageous tariff legislation, $1 in Europe will often buy as much as $2 will buy here. I do not believe, Mr. Chairman, if the enormous profits the tariff-swollen manufacturers now receive were doubled that the wages of American labor would increase 1 cent, for the protectionist is selfish; he is unwilling to divide his spoil with anyone. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

If, Mr. Chairman, the condition of the American workingman has improved, I for one will never believe that this condition has been brought about either through tariff legislation or by the generosity of the great manufacturing trusts of the country, but rather that it has been wrung from these trusts by the increased demand for manufactured articles, by the improved machinery of the manufacturer, by the efficiency and skill of the American workingman, and, above all, by the strength and potency and power of organized American labor. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Protection works a hardship on the farmer. He sells his products in competition with the world, yet everything he buys for his home, his farm, and his family pays tribute to the tariff. We have heard much in the last few days about taking the tariff away from the farmer. The protection friends of the farmer have attempted to deceive him by placing a tariff on agricultural products. This tax is nothing but a sham and a deception. The theory of a protected tariff is to protect the home product from competition from abroad. Why, a tax of 1 cent or 100 cents upon each pound of short staple cotton brought into this country would have no more effect upon the price of short cotton than the fall of Troy, for short staple cotton is not imported into this country. Liverpool does not export cotton to Vicksburg, because cotton can be bought cheaper in Vicksburg than it can in Liverpool, but Vicksburg does export cotton to Liverpool, because it can be sold for more in Liverpool than in Vicksburg. Paris does not export cattle and hogs, nor does Berlin and Moscow export wheat to Chicago. London does not export corn to St. Louis. Cattle, hogs, and live stock generally and corn and wheat and other agricultural products can be more profitably raised in the United States than they can abroad.

If these products can not be successfully brought into the United States and sold at a profit, if it be impossible for foreign agricultural products to successfully compete on American soil with American-raised products, then a tariff on these products of $1 or $10 would have absolutely no effect upon the price of these products. It would have no effect, either by way of revenue to the Government or protection to the farmer. There would be no revenue to the Government, because foreign products could not afford to be brought into the United States and sold at a loss; and there would be no protection to the farmer, for there would be nothing to protect, as these products do not come into competition with American-raised products.

Yet, Mr. Chairman, flimsy pretexts of this kind are used to console the farmer for the millions of dollars wrung from his pockets every year by the plundering hand of a tariff. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

All that he makes he sells in competition with the world, regulated by the inexorable law of supply and demand; yet when he buys he is forced to pay to the Steel Trust a subsidy of over 11 cents on every pound of hinges and bolts that he may need for his house and his barn. He is forced to pay a tax of $4.50 on every $10 worth of chains that he may need on his farm. He is forced to pay a tariff of 40 cents on every dollar's worth of table and kitchen utensils for his household. He is forced to give the trust an extra profit of 25 cents on every dollar he puts in a saw. He is forced to pay a tribute of $1.50 on a $10 plow and $1.20 on an $8 harrow. He is forced to pay 15 cents for every dollar that goes into a gin stand, into a harvester, a mowing machine, or a cultivator. He is forced to pay to the Agricultural Implement Trust a subsidy of $26.25 on a $75 wagon. He is forced to pay to the three or four concerns which constitute the Bagging Trust a tax of over 5 cents for the bagging which wraps each bale of his cotton.

The distinguished gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] made a statement on the floor of the House the other day, in which he said, in response to a question propounded to him by me, that if the tax were taken off of cotton bagging the revenue lost to the Government would be over $6,500,000. He confused the tax on bagging with that of burlaps, bags, and so forth, for if every bale of cotton grown in the United States, based on a 12,000,000-bale crop, were wrapped in imported bagging it would only amount to about $625,000. Yet of this $625,000 less than $100,000 goes into the Treasury of the United States; the balance, of over half a million dollars, is wrung from the farmers of the South and goes into the coffers of the Bagging Trust. It costs the farmers of the South over $600,000 to wrap the products of their soil, while binding twine, made from the same vegetable, the same piece of jute, is given absolutely free to the farmers of the West to bind up the products of their soil. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The farmer is forced to pay to the Woolen Trust three prices for the blankets he puts upon his bed and upon every woolen article he may buy for his family to protect them from the chilling blasts of winter. He is forced to pay this same trust a subsidy of from $6 to $8 upon every $10 suit of woolen clothing he may buy for his boys. He is robbed and plundered in a thousand ways, and if he murmurs, if he is disposed to object to this system of legalized highway robbery, if he complains because of this unjust discrimination, he is comforted and consoled by the assurance that his interest has been well taken care of, he has been protected as well as the manufacturer, for he has been given a tax on agricultural products.

Mr. Chairman, the gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber may talk about the beauties and glories of protection until they are black in the face, but the fact remains that the American people, becoming dissatisfied with the unjust and unequal system of taxation prevailing in this country, have turned the regulation of these matters over to the Democratic Party [applause on the Democratic side]—a party founded upon the principles of right and justice, as eternal, as everlasting as the hills themselves. Millions of anxious people to-day are turning their eyes in this direction and looking to us to tear down the great wall of protection which stands between them and prosperity. The dismal prophecies of ruin and disaster made by our political opponents, as they saw the power of governmental control slipping from them, after nearly half a century of abuse and misrule of that power, have turned out to be about as true as the average Republican promise. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The wise, conservative policy adopted by the Democratic Members of this House since the November election has excited the admiration of the country and won even the reluctant respect of our adversaries. The Democratic Party to-day stands united, shoulder to shoulder, like a Grecian phalanx, presenting an impenetrable, an impregnable front to all enemies of good government and equal legislation. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The absolute harmony prevailing in our counsels and the fixed and steady determination to carry out every promise and pledge made by our party may well cause consternation in the ranks of the opposition. Those whose only hope to regain lost political preferment is to profit by the errors of their adversaries have at least thus far met with a cruel, a bitter disappointment.

But, Mr. Chairman, far be it from me at this or any other time to present the appearance of boasting over the destroyed fortunes of a fallen, a repudiated, and a demoralized adversary. It would be too ungenerous. Still all teachings of the past, all lessons of history, are criterions by which the wise who would profit are guided.

A little over two years ago a great political party assumed the responsibilities of government. In absolute control of every governmental department, flushed with the intoxication of victory, drunk with the exercise of power, enriched by the spoils of office, strengthened by the dispensing of an enormous patronage, swollen with the conceit of repeated and continued indorsement, fancying they possessed the confidence of a majority of the American people, they were serene and confident in the full assurance of their strength and power. But to-day, despite all those tremendous advantages, to-day their majorities are gone, their pride is humbled, the confidence they once inspired has vanished, their strength and boasted power is dissipated, and that once great political organization hopelessly and helplessly drifting on a sea of broken promises was on the 8th day of last November completely wrecked and shattered on the rocks and shoals of duplicity and deception. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

It is sad to profit by the misfortunes of others, nevertheless wisdom would not permit, nor would prudence dictate or common sense approve, that we, commissioned by an indignant and disappointed people, should invade the depths of error and commit ourselves to the similar fate which has characterized your course, crowned as it has been by deception and defeat. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The promise made by you with apparent sincerity to the people, but shamelessly broken and betrayed, that promise is now committed to our hands for redemption, by the lessening of burdens made grievous and unbearable, by unjust discrimination and unpardonable partiality. And responsibility for failure to lift these burdens will be laid at your door, when all earnest and honest effort, here in this House accomplished, shall meet with either indorsement or rejection at your hands in other places, as you will, and possess the power to do. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, an honest reduction of the prohibitive rates of this outrageous tariff is what the great masses of the American people demand, expect, and implore; and, so help me God, I believe and feel, in spite of Republican protest and Republican opposition, that the Democratic Party is going to give it to them. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The reduction of these prohibitive rates may affect some manufactories which have fattened at the expense of the public. It may reduce the enormous profits of some tariff-swollen industries. It may make some of the recipients of favored legislation feel resentful and abused. It may do all this, but an honest reduction of the prohibitive rates of this tariff will result in tremendous importance and benefit to the great masses of the American people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

And though the spoilsman and the camp follower, like the Arabs of old, may "fold their tents and silently steal away," yet all patriotic lovers of their country and good government will remain.

Mr. Chairman, since man first established an organized government there has always been present those who sought to further their own selfish ends at the expense of that government. Such selfishness is present in our country to-day. Special interest and favored legislation are now interwoven throughout the warp and woof of our system of government. The struggle for the rights of man, for equal legislation, which has been going on for centuries, is going on to-day. Every man who presumes to legislate for others must take part in this struggle. For him there can be no middle ground. He will be forced out into the open field. He will be forced to stand on the one side or the other, for the skulker and the coward will be shot between the lines. On the side of manhood, of civic virtue, of human liberty, of equal legislation, of local self-government, of the Constitution of the fathers; or, on the side of privilege and class, of the dollar and its material reward, of favored legislation and Federal encroachment. [Prolonged applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER].

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, enough has certainly been said on this measure to justify action one way or the other without further debate; and my excuse for inflicting this effusion upon this unoffending presence is that I have heard from the boys at home. [Laughter and applause.]

This farmers' free-list bill is the logical complement to the Canadian reciprocity bill in that it unlocks to a freer exchange of commodities the door so long kept closed by the restrictive policy of Republican protection. Moreover, it is a step toward the reduction of the much-discussed high cost of living, which is perhaps felt most acutely by that class of people known as the farmer and laboring man.

It has always been asserted by the apostles of high protection on that side of the House that by giving the farmer cheaper commodities we do an injustice to the workingman; but now that you seem to be impaled on the other horn of the dilemma, you face about and tell us that by giving the laboring man cheaper commodities we do an injustice to the farmer. You set your argument like the Arkansas negro set his 'coon trap—so as to catch 'em a-comin' and a-gwine.

When I was being initiated into the book learning of the white man I was caused to take up a study called philosophy, or physics. By that study I came, in my simple way, to understand something of the principles of gravitation and equilibrium. One of the examples given my class was that of the seesaw. We were shown, by practical application, that when weight was applied to one end of the seesaw gravitation inevitably overcame equilibrium; that end went down and the other end up. But now our friends across the aisle seem to be following some kind of nebulous, will-o'-the-wisp sophistry which teaches that both ends of the seesaw can be raised at once.

Ah! my friends of the minority, you can not ride both ends of the seesaw at one and the same time. We know that you are professional political acrobats, but you can not perform the impossible feat of riding two horses going in exactly opposite directions. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

If your protective policy really assists the manufacturers, if it actually gives them higher prices for their products, then, by the simple reasoning of deduction, somebody must pay the freight. You can not take something from nothing. The farmer knows that if the protected manufacturing industry is given an additional profit, it is done at the expense and discouragement of agricultural and pastoral pursuits, and you can not longer throw dust in the eyes of the American farmer with your protective-farm-product "bunco." Do not deceive yourselves about the American laborer, either, for whatever false defense you may make of your tariff plunder, you can no longer convince the workingman that he is getting a square division of the spoils.

Against your protective-tariff system we make the charge of inequality and injustice. We charge that such policy has been carried to the limit of unmitigated graft; and we on this side of the House believe that, whether legalized or outlawed, graft has no vested rights and inequality and injustice no just claim to respectability. [Applause.]

MEXICAN GHOST HUNTERS.

Some of the boys at home have been exercising themselves about the products of Mexico, and especially have some of our stock men become uneasy about the importation of Mexican cattle and their products.

I will insert in the RECORD some data, taken from the Statistical Abstract and Commerce and Finance of 1909, a careful study of which should put to an eternal end all ghost hunting in that vicinity:

CATTLE.

	Number.
Imported from Mexico, 1909 (p. 164, Commerce and Finance, 1909)	128,069
Exported to Mexico, 1909 (p. 468, Commerce and Finance, 1909)	8,372
Total cattle in United States Jan. 1, 1910 (p. 734, Statistical Abstract, 1909)	69,080,000
Total cattle in Mexico, 1902	5,142,457

COAL.

	Tons.
Bituminous, imported from Mexico, 1909 (p. 206, Commerce and Finance, 1909)	42
Anthracite, exported to Mexico, 1909 (p. 510, Commerce and Finance, 1909)	1,049
Bituminous, exported to Mexico, 1909 (p. 510, Commerce and Finance, 1909)	655,786
Total anthracite produced in United States, 1909 (p. 593, Statistical Abstract, 1909)	74,347,102
Total bituminous produced in the United States, 1909 (p. 594, Statistical Abstract, 1909)	296,941,021
Anthracite and bituminous in Oklahoma, 1908 (p. 204, Statistical Abstract, 1909)	2,632,246
	Short tons.
Estimated supply in Oklahoma (p. 31, Statistical Abstract, 1909)	79,219,000

OIL.

	Gallons.
Imported from Mexico, 1909 (p. 297, Commerce and Finance, 1909), value $321	6,978
Exported to Mexico, 1909 (p. 660, Commerce and Finance, 1909), value $1,184,398	27,554,581

If these "Mexican ghost hunters" will glance but casually into these figures they will find that the total number of cattle in the United States on January 1, 1910, was over 69,000,000 head, and the total number of cattle in Mexico, from the last reports I have been able to get, was only a little over 5,000,000. The population of the United States, by the recent census, is something like 92,000,000 persons, that of Mexico something over 13,000,000 persons. By a simple calculation it will be seen that in the United States there are about 7 cattle to every 9 persons, while in Mexico there are only 7 cattle to every 17 persons. What does this show? It shows that if the tariff is removed and the bars taken down between the two countries the movement of cattle products must necessarily be toward Mexico rather than from Mexico, so that instead of the much-feared importation of Mexican beef our southwestern stockmen will have an opportunity to supply the Mexican trade.

This calls to my mind the panic of the oil and coal operators of Oklahoma two years ago when the Payne-Aldrich tariff law was under consideration. It then looked as if the tariff would be reduced on oil, and the oil magnates of our country thronged the corridors of every hotel in this city.

We were told that with a low tariff Mexican oil would practically displace the product of Texas and Oklahoma, and yet it will be seen from above figures that Mexico sold to us during that very year only 6,978 gallons, valued at $321, while we sold for Mexican consumption 27,554,581 gallons, at a valuation of $1,184,398. In other words, for every gallon of oil imported into the United States from Mexico, about 4,000 gallons were exported from this country to Mexico.

We were told if oil were placed on the free list, it would eternally ruin all the independent producers. Oil was placed on the free list, the price has been maintained, and production in Oklahoma has increased ever since that date.

We also heard ghost stories about Mexican coal supplying the American trade, and yet the above table shows that only 42 tons of bituminous coal were imported from Mexico into the United States during the entire year 1909.

COMPARISON WITH PAYNE-ALDRICH LAW FREE LIST.

My Republican friends, you criticise this farmers' free-list bill. Let us see how it compares with your free list in the Payne-Aldrich tariff law.

One of the first things that arrests our attention in your free list is apatite, yet the only thing you have given the farmer with which to satisfy this appetite is manna; and as manna does not seem to be raining from the skies any more, in these days of boasted Republican prosperity, we have given the farmer something more substantial, by placing in our free list all kinds of meats, bread, breakfast food, and meal and flour of all character and description.

Dragon's blood and dried blood are on the Republican free list. How perfectly in keeping with the blood-sucking policy of a high protective tariff! Instead of these sanguinary exhibits we give to the farmer free barbed wire, free baling wire, free fence wire, and free cotton ties.

Fossils and skeletons are on your free list. An archæological research instituted by our retrenchment committee just before the convening of this session of Congress disclosed the existence of fossils galore right about the sacred precincts of this Chamber. All of them have been exported at a saving to the people of more than $180,000 per annum. But if you are looking for skeletons, just peep into a Republican closet and you will find enough skeletons to frighten an Alabama negro into the Gulf of Mexico. We do not recognize the existence of fossils and skeletons in the Democratic Party, so we have given to the farmer free timber and free lumber—surcease to the homebuilder from the extortions of the Lumber Trust.

Leeches! Shades of Lincoln! My Republican friends, is there no limit to your presumption? If there is anything on earth that this country has become overstocked with during your Republican system of high protection, it is leeches. During the very days of the consideration of the Payne-Aldrich tariff law, right about the corridors of this Capitol could be found constantly a home production of full-fledged, life-size leeches, sufficient in number to supply the American market for the next century to come, and they will abide with us so long as we adhere to the policy of protection. Instead of free leeches, we give to the farmer free shoes, free saddles, free harness, free belting, and all other products of leather free of duty.

But we are going to be perfectly fair with our Republican friends. In one point, you have been extremely generous to the American farmer. You have given him free radium. This wonderful substance, we all know, is worth about a million dollars an ounce, if indeed there is an ounce in the entire world to-day. Now, just think what a terrible fix an American farmer would be in if he had to pay a duty of 25 per cent ad valorem on all the imported radium he uses.. Notwithstanding this solicitude of the Republican Party, I believe that the farmers in my part of the country will look with more favor upon free cotton bagging, free burlaps, and other materials suitable for covering the staple crop of the South.

But, Mr. Chairman, I believe we would be unfair and unjust to the leaders of the great Republican Party if we should close this comparison without calling attention to the fact that they have placed upon the free list the wonderful articles of divi-divi and spunk. For lo, these many years it has required all the spunk the American farmer could muster to "divy" with the Agricultural Implement Trust that has been made possible by your high protective tariff, and which now sits upon the neck of the American farmer like the Old Man of the Sea sat on Sinbad the Sailor. We think the American farmer has been tortured quite long enough, so by this bill we propose to clip the tentacles of this hydra-headed monster by giving the farmer free plows, free harvesters, free harrows, free reapers, free thrashing machines, free cotton gins, free farm wagons, and all other agricultural implements absolutely free of duty, much to the confusion and mystification of the usually astute mind of the distinguished leader of the minority in this House.

MINORITY LEADER'S CRITICISM.

The genial leader of the minority in this House is admittedly a man of transcendent ability. Many times have I, as other Members, sat in my seat in this Chamber and admired, yea, even marveled with amazement at, what seemed to be his almost boundless information and infinite understanding, not only of the tariff, but all other questions of economics and governmental affairs. Yet, when analyzed, we find this gentleman's bitter three hours' castigation of this farmers' free-list bill to be purely along the lines of technical detail rather than an attack on the principle involved. The summa summarum of his three hours' hypercritical, hair-splitting criticism was his inability to properly define agricultural implements. "The mountain labored and brought forth a mouse."

After the gentleman's experience with the Payne-Aldrich tariff law, written by his own party, it is little wonder that he now demands obiter dictum decisions even before first action is taken on a tariff bill. Since the Payne-Aldrich tariff roller was run over him two years ago, like a refractory mule that has been hit over the head with a blind bridle, he is a little bit "skittish." [Laughter and applause.]

CANADIAN RECIPROCITY TREATY.

When the Canadian reciprocity bill passed this House many of our friends on that side found a great deal of fault with us because we did not amend this treaty and place many other things on the free list. I am sorry the education of our friends across the way has been so sadly neglected along the line of international law. It has always been my understanding that the making of an agreement required the consent of two contracting parties, and that it was equally necessary to consult both these parties if amendments were to be brought about.

Mr. KOPP. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARTER. With pleasure.

Mr. KOPP. Does the gentleman take the position that in the Canadian reciprocity, so called, the two Nations were contracting parties?

Mr. CARTER. Why, certainly. In the making of a treaty between nations it is just as necessary to have the consent of two contracting parties as in making an agreement between individuals.

Mr. KOPP. What authority has the President to enter into a contract of this kind?

Mr. CARTER. O Mr. Chairman, I take pleasure in yielding to my friend from Wisconsin for any pertinent question, but I can not permit him to go into the closets of his party and drag forth his Republican skeletons to be dissected during the short time allotted to me. [Laughter.]

Mr. KOPP. I would like the gentleman to answer the question.

Mr. CARTER. The gentleman knows that this is a deep question of law, and I could not attempt to answer it and complete my speech in the short time I have remaining. The American people are not looking so much for methods as they are for results.

I want to say further to the gentleman that had we, on this side, been given the opportunity of negotiating and making this treaty from its incipiency, I am frank to confess that it might have been a much different document. We would have placed many things on the free list it does not now contain and would have made other reductions. You must not be unmindful of the fact that this agreement was negotiated by a Republican President with all the Republican ideas of high protection, and we, on this side, accepted it, not as expressive of our ideals, but as the very best that could be wrung from a Republican administration. [Great applause on the Democratic side.]

Our genial friend from Michigan [Mr. HAMILTON] contributed his protest against the Canadian reciprocity treaty. He labored in great agitation and fear that the farmers of his district were being treated unfairly, and said that by the passage of this reciprocity treaty the first session of the Sixty-second Congress would go down in history as the "antifarmers' Congress."

Now, I am sorry the gentleman from Michigan, who is usually so prompt in his attendance, seems to be absent to-day, for I wanted to ask him this question: For the same reason set forth by him, could not the present Republican administration be known as the "antifarmers' administration"? And by the same token, might not the present President, who negotiated this treaty, be considered as an "antifarmers' President"? And if this "antifarmers' President" should be renominated by the Republican convention, would the distinguished gentleman, who is now shedding crocodile tears for his Michigan farmer constituents, give this "antifarmers' candidate" his support?

ROOSEVELT MAGAZINE REBUKES PROGRESSIVE REPUBLICANS.

I now desire to have placed in the RECORD an editorial from the Outlook magazine, of February 25, 1911, under the caption "Canadian Reciprocity would Help the Farmers."

Mr. KOPP. Will the gentleman yield for one more question?

Mr. CARTER. With pleasure, sir.

Mr. KOPP. The gentleman states that he will place in the RECORD an article to the effect that Canadian reciprocity will help the farmers; is it the gentleman's position that Canadian reciprocity will help the American farmer?

Mr. CARTER. The gentleman anticipates my argument. I certainly am convinced that this Canadian reciprocity treaty will enlarge and extend the market of the American farmer. But I simply want to say this to my "insurgent" friend. He should remember that this Outlook magazine is the same periodical that has on its staff as contributing editor one Theodore Roosevelt, who is the very bull-goose of Republican insurgency, and that ought to be sufficient guaranty to the gentleman from Wisconsin. [Great laughter and applause.]

Mr. KOPP. Will the gentleman explain the term he indulges in?

Mr. ANTHONY. That is Choctaw.

Mr. ADAIR. That term is peculiar to Oklahoma.

Mr. CARTER. I will open up my night school for the gentleman's benefit privately. [Laughter.]

CANADIAN RECIPROCITY WOULD HELP THE FARMERS.

[From the Outlook, Feb. 25, 1911.]

Canadian reciprocity was commended last week in notable speeches from both President Taft and ex-President Roosevelt. The House of Representatives passed the reciprocity bill a few days later. * * *

Nearly every Democrat voted for it, and thus saved the day for President Taft, who was not even supported by a majority of his own party in the House. * * *

That most of the progressive Republicans should find their places with the "standpatters" seems disconcerting. It is due, however, to a misconception on the part of many farmers of the Middle States and their Representatives in Congress as to the present protection afforded them. The proposed reciprocity would remove that protection. Hence the farmers declare that they are being discriminated against. Are they? Take the effect on corn. As President Taft has pointed out, our production last year exceeded 3,000,000,000 bushels. We exported 44,000,000, and used the rest in domestic consumption, chiefly in raising cattle. In consequence, of live cattle and packinghouse products we exported no less than $135,000,000 worth. On the other hand, the Canadian production was only six-tenths of 1 per cent of ours. Moreover, we exported 6,000,000 bushels of corn to Canada. So far as corn is concerned, therefore, the American farmer will remain king, reciprocity or no reciprocity. Second, how would the agreement affect wheat? The price of our wheat, as the President says, like that of Canada, Russia, Argentina, and every other wheat-exporting country, is fixed at Liverpool, the greatest wheat emporium, and is a result of competition there of all the exporting countries. Hence our tariff duty makes no difference in the price of wheat in the United States, and the sending of any part of Canada's surplus through our country instead of through Canada, to be milled or exported, would not affect the price of wheat for our farmers. But what would favorably affect them would be the result of giving to Canadian wheat transportation, warehousing, and milling facilities at a less cost, for any increased trade for our elevators, mills, and railways must inevitably react favorably on the farmers themselves. Third, how does the agreement affect barley? By the mutual withdrawal of duties more barley would doubtless come into New York from Ontario, but at least as much of ours would cross the line at Wisconsin and Minnesota, thus preventing the useless hauling of Ontario barley to western Canada and of our western barley to New York. On farm products in general, we would add, the tariff can not be compared to the tariff on manufactures. The first does not protect; the second does. The prices of our manufactures are not fixed in free competition with all the world, as are the prices of our farm products. As a net result our farmers have not only got no increase of price by the tariff on agricultural products; they have actually had to pay more for what they buy of manufactured products because of the protection on those products.

WHEAT.

Mr. CARTER. So far as I could glean from their nightmares and ghost dances, the gentlemen who opposed the Canadian reciprocity bill only claimed hazard to one American farm product, and that product was wheat.

We were told that the enactment of the Canadian reciprocity agreement would throw the American market open to Canadian wheat, causing such an influx of the Canadian product into this country as to seriously injure, if not completely destroy, the American market on grain. But the weight of facts and statistics produced during the debate on this measure do not warrant any such pessimistic prediction. On the contrary, the figures given by a great majority of the best-informed men on both sides of this House would indicate that the placing of wheat on the free list between United States and Canada would, instead of restricting, broaden and expand the market of the farmers of the United States.

I submit the following figures as facts which were not successfully controverted during the debate:

Wheat production, year ending June 30, 1910.

	Bushels.
United States (Statistical Abstract)	695,443,000
Canada (Department of Commerce and Labor)	149,989,600
Wheat exports.
United States (Statistical Abstract)	114,268,468
Canada (Department of Commerce and Labor)	49,741,350
	Value.
United States exported to Canada	$4,442,307
Canada sold to United States	766,254

Total interchange of products, five years ending June 30, 1910.

United States to Canada	$886,417,376
Canada to United States	393,913,673
Balance in our favor	492,503,703

Tillable land values.

The average price per acre in Canada (Hill's speech)	$38.60
The average price per acre in United States (Hill's speech)	23.40

Wages about the same in both countries.

It has been claimed, pro and con, that the price of wheat is higher both in Canada and in the United States. All of these claims being made by gentlemen of unquestioned integrity, I suppose it is fair to assume that there is practically no difference in the average price of wheat in the United States and the average price in Canada.

If the production of wheat in the United States is almost five times as great as the production in Canada, will not American wheat have more effect on the general market than Canadian wheat?

Since we sold to Canada more than six times as much wheat as Canada sold to us, does it not follow that Canada is a six times greater consumer of American wheat than America is of Canadian wheat?

Since we sold in the world's markets more than twice as much wheat as Canada, are we not pressed more than twice as much as Canada for an open market?

With labor wages and price of wheat equal in both countries and wheat land 65 per cent higher in Canada than in the United States, will it be possible for the Canadian farmer to produce cheaper and undersell the American farmer in any wheat market on the face of the earth?

With American wheat having a greater force in the world's market; with the Canadian farmer unable to undersell the American farmer; with two and one-half times as much wheat exports to the world's markets as Canada; with the balance of wheat trade, as between Canada and the United States, in our favor at the rate of 6 to 1, and a general balance of trade between the two countries for the last five years in our favor at the ratio of $8.86 to $3.93—more than 2 to 1—how can an interchange of such a commodity free of duty be of anything except benefit to the marketing and value of the wheat of the farmers of the United States? In the language of DORSEY SHACKLEFORD, "Is not Canada a good country for us to trade with?"

RECENT RECORD OF TWO PARTIES CONTRASTED.

Now, in conclusion, permit me to say that the die is cast and we are satisfied with the issue.

Two and one-half years ago the Democratic and Republican parties went before the people of this country in a political campaign. We promised to revise the tariff downward, and so did you. The people elected a majority of Republicans in the House and Senate, and, strangely enough, to your stewardship was committed a revision of the tariff downward. Shortly thereafter you met in extra session, with an overwhelming majority in both legislative Chambers; in full control of every branch of this Government. For five long months you bickered and dickered, wrangled and jangled, growled and howled over a division of the "swag" like a pack of hungry wolves over a putrid carcass. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And what was the result? The Payne-Aldrich tariff law, violating and repudiating every campaign promise you had made to the people. [Prolonged applause on the Democratic side.] They "asked you for bread and you gave them a stone."

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CARTER. Yes, sir. I am always glad to yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MADDEN. Have the Democrats agreed on the wool schedule yet? [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. CARTER. I have not the time to discuss that at length, but I simply want to say that we will agree on it—don't you fret. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

So much for your record in dealing with the people's rights. Now mark the contrast, Mr. Chairman. About six months ago we had another political contest, and when the smoke of battle had cleared away it was found that the Democrats had won.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. CARTER. Sure.

Mr. MADDEN. Do they not use smokeless powder?

Mr. CARTER. Sometimes; but the gentleman from Illinois never uses it, because it does not make enough noise. [Laughter.]

When the tally was made this time it was found that these very same people had returned a Democratic majority on this very same issue—revision of the tariff downward. [Applause on the Democratic side.] True, we also pledged in our platform a liberal revision of the House rules. You scoffed. You hooted. You sneered. You said that we were tyros; you said we were disruptionists and ignoramuses; you said that we could not get together on any proposition; that we could not revise the rules of this House in accordance with our platform pledges, and that if we did make such revision we could not conduct the business of this House under such dissolute and wanton rules. You laid great stress upon the fact that there were so many protectionists among the Democrats a revision of the tariff downward by us would be impossible.

Let us compare our record. Just 33 days ago we met in extra session, with a Democratic majority in this House. We have revised the House rules strictly in accordance with ante-election promises. Despite your prediction of chaos and failure, we have conducted the business of this House in a fair and orderly manner, and every Member, no matter what his political faith, has been given his opportunity. [Applause on the Democratic side.] We have passed a campaign publicity bill which gives real publicity to campaign expenses. In so far as this House is concerned, we have provided for direct election of United States Senators by the people. We have begun a bona fide reduction of the tariff by the passage of the Canadian reciprocity treaty, wherein it has been our privilege to uphold the hands of that Republican President whom you so shamelessly repudiated. [Applause.] We are carrying that tariff reform still further with the enactment of this farmers' free-list bill. We will complete that reform before this session is over by the passage of other such meritorious tariff bills as the people have demanded. We have presented to you a party discipline and unity of purpose that has challenged your amazement and admiration. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CARTER. I desire just a few minutes more. Our leader does not seem to be present, so I think I will yield myself a couple of minutes. [Laughter.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman two minutes.

Mr. KENDALL. The gentleman stated the other day——

Mr. CARTER. I am sorry I can not yield just now. I must finish my remarks in two minutes. I will be glad to yield if I have any time left.

Before many months we will again be in the throes of a political campaign, and you will be forced before the people, reeking with dissension and handicapped by repudiation. [Applause on the Democratic side.] While we will go forth clad in the armor of honest achievement, presenting an uniformity of purpose and solidarity of front rivaling the discipline of the old guard of the great French army and the battle tocsin shall be, "By their fruits ye shall know them." [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I now yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KENDALL].

Mr. KENDALL. I was about to inquire of the gentleman if he is in sympathy with one of his colleagues who spoke here the other day with reference to tariff reform by imposing a duty on coffee and tea. The statement was made here by one of the most brilliant and attractive speakers on that side that that would be the final policy.

Mr. CARTER. I do not know to whom the gentleman refers. Neither am I, in my humble capacity, attempting to outline a policy which has not yet been discussed by our party caucus. I will tell the gentleman this: That we expect shortly to have an income tax and thereunder we hope gradually to do away with abuses of a high tariff. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I thank you, gentlemen, for your kind attention.

Mr. DALZELL. I yield one hour to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say a few words touching the pending bill, but I hardly expect to use the hour which has been allotted to me. What is the pending measure? "Oh," you say, "it is a great free-list bill." What inspired it? Another bill which you passed a short time ago carrying into effect a proposed agreement with Canada providing for what is called reciprocal trade between the two countries—an agreement which you say goes a long way in the direction of the Democratic policy of free trade and away from the Republican policy of protection. So far as I am concerned, I confess both allegations.

I want to talk, not about Hamilton—he is dead; not about Jefferson—he is dead; not about the great men who have gone before and have crossed over—they are dead; and oh—not meaning to be personal—how we do misrepresent them, and being dead, they can not defend themselves. [Laughter.]

I desire to speak about the bill that is pending, and for a text I want to read from the majority report, written, no doubt, by the eminent gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], chairman of the Ways and Means Committee. I read from page 4 of that report:

In fact, action on the Canadian agreement involves the necessity of further and immediate action—

Not postponed action—

in removing a number of duties on imports from other countries—

Not from Canada alone—

in order that justice may be done to the great army of our agricultural producers, who, in the Canadian agreement, are to have all the alleged protection removed from their products without a corresponding or reciprocal removal of the protective duties most burdensome on the commodities they must purchase as necessary to sustain their lives and industries.

Immediate justice! The necessity arises from the proposed enactment of the Canadian pact, negotiated by the President, passed after caucus action by almost a unanimous Democratic vote, and so burdened with injustice, which is to be vitalized by your act, that you rush in to try to make compensation therefor.

A stern chase is a long chase, according to the old saying; but you start out to catch up with the act of injustice known as the reciprocity bill, the enactment of which has been demanded by the President, and urged by the great publishing interest, with all the power which that combination has; and it is proclaimed by the President, by you, and by your party friends in the Senate that that bill is morally certain to be enacted into law. You make a creation that you yourselves spit upon and say will sacrifice the interests of one-third of 92,000,000 people, and then send after it, as you propose now to do, this so-called free-trade bill.

If you did not intend to cheat, why did you not put it in the other bill and let the injustice that is carried by that agreement with Canada, which you vitalized, be corrected at the same time that it is perpetrated? You know, we all know, the farmer knows, that this "justice," as you call it, will not overtake the injustice wrought by the reciprocity bill during the lifetime of this Congress. [Applause on the Republican side.] You start out with the presumption that the farmer is a fool; that you can hoodwink him; that he is a hayseed. Others outside of this body, including the publishers, think they can satisfy him by such a bill as this and by the statement that in the event the Canadian pact is ratified, after it has been tried on the farmer, if it does not act well, it can be repealed. The situation reminds me of the man who bought a patent medicine of a faker upon the street corner and took it home. It purported to be an absolute cure for all the ills of mankind; but the good wife said, "My dear husband, do not let us give it to the children." "What shall we do with it?" said he. "I bought it. I can not afford to give it away or destroy it." "Oh," said she, "try it on the dog. If it does not kill him then the children can take it." I do not proclaim myself as the special protector of the agricultural interests of the country, but I do say that the farmer is not the dog upon whom to experiment. [Applause on the Republican side.]

In the many campaign speeches I have made to city audiences and to audiences in the country, I never have talked to audiences as exacting and, on the average, to audiences as intelligent as I find in the agricultural districts. [Applause.] There is an old saying, "Beware of the man of but one book." This can no longer be applied to the farmer, if it ever could. He is now a man of many books, and, in addition, he has sunshine, the open air, and opportunity for thought, even during his working hours. I feel a little bit humiliated when it is proposed by this bill to apply a remedy or salve to cure the injustice of the reciprocity measure, because whatever there is of good in me, and whatever there is of good in most of us, comes from having been born in an agricultural community, having our feet, so to express it, in the soil; and it is quite as hard to fool the average farmer touching his material interests, touching law, order, and good government, as it is to fool gentlemen on the floor of this House.

What is this balm in Gilead? What is it going to do for the farmer? Under the reciprocity pact animals on the hoof from Canada come in free. They are reciprocally free between the two countries, but meat is taxed. While that hurts the farmer and does him a great injustice, you pass a measure to that effect because you want to cheapen the cost of living. But let us see what you do when you enact this free-trade law. We sell our meat products abroad pretty liberally. Other countries sell their meat products abroad. Who would be our competitors in this market? In Germany there are high duties and strict inspection, and the same is true of France. Meat goes free into Great Britain, but, so far as I recollect, it is not admitted free into any great country in the world, and possibly into no country save alone Great Britain.

Having let animals on the hoof come in free from Canada, which is very bad for the farmer, as it is also to let Canadian wheat come in free, you say that you are going to protect him. How? By letting animals come in on the hoof free from all the world? Nay, nay! Oh, I wonder if there is present any Representative from Texas, one of whom, I believe, is a member of the Ways and Means Committee, which helped shape this bill. Gentlemen representing Texas districts, why did you not in this bill let animals on the hoof come free into our markets? Why did you allow a tax of from $2 to $4 a head remain on live cattle? How patriotic you are! Oh, how you are agonizing for a free list! Texas is a great big country—a magnificent empire—soon to be, in the swing of the first half of the twentieth century, the most populous State in the Union, save alone New York.

Why did you not provide that cattle on the hoof from all the world should be admitted into the United States free, as you did in the case of Canadian cattle? I searched for a reason, and, lo and behold, I found that, year by year, multiplied, thousands of cattle come in from Mexico across that imaginary line that is supposed to run between Mexico and the United States. Texas borders on Mexico for many hundred miles. You have live-stock associations, and you raise cattle and sheep on your wonderful grazing lands. You want to reduce the cost of living, and you propose to admit free of duty wheat from all the world, as well as from Canada, and also corn and meat; but do you know that after I eat corn for a month I want a little bit of wheat cereal, and after awhile I get tired of that and I take to rice for a day or two. [Laughter.] I wish—and I yield time to any member of the Ways and Means Committee to answer the question in two or three sentences—I wish to know why it is that when you reported this free-trade bill, to let the farmer come into his own and the laboring man have cheaper living, you did not put rice on the free list.

I am reminded in this connection of an eminent Member of this House, now dead and gone, one of the best legislators I ever knew. I will not call his name, but he was a splendid and charming man. With three or four drinks his tongue would become loosened, and one day at Willard's he fell into conversation with Judge Ela, of New Hampshire, I think, at that time one of the departmental auditors and formerly a Member of the House. He said to him: "Judge Ela, I recollect very well our service together in the Congress." The judge replied: "Oh, it was most pleasant to me. We were on opposite sides of the House, but we were both called watchdogs of the Treasury." His friend answered: "So we were, so we were, Judge Ela;" and, having had the fourth drink, he continued: "But we always had the true instincts of a good watchdog—we knew enough not to bark when our friends were around." [Prolonged laughter and applause.]

Now it will be in order for some gentleman from Texas or Mississippi to rise in his place when I get through speaking and pay a tribute to Thomas Jefferson. [Applause on the Republican side.] But, as I have said before, Jefferson is dead.

What has the farmer to fear from the free importation of foreign meat? From the Statesman's Yearbook, a British publication, which, by the way, is, I think, for correctness and for full information, the best manual published anywhere, I find that down in Argentina, in the Temperate Zone, with as good climate as we have, with as good soil as we have, there is a country rapidly growing and developing. The population of the United States is 92,000,000; that of Argentina, in 1908, was estimated at 6,489,023. The area of Argentina is 728,680,000 acres, of which 253,195,000 may be used for agriculture or cattle industries. In the territories the Federal Government has wide tracts of land, amounting to 238,000,000 acres, suitable in general for pastoral colonization.

These lands are conditionally offered free or for sale or on lease. Excluding Alaska, Argentina has one-half as much good land as has the United States. The total area under cultivation in Argentina in 1908 was 39,100,000 acres, of which 15,000,000 acres were in wheat, 4,000,000 acres in flax, 7,500,000 acres in maize or corn, and 1,500,000 acres in oats. While Argentina is a great country for wheat and cereal crops, it is to even a greater extent a cattle country. In 1909 there were in the United States 71,099,000 head of cattle; in Argentina in 1908, 29,116,625 head. Horses, United States, twenty and a half million head; Argentina, seven and a half million head. Sheep, United States, 56,000,000; Argentina, 67,000,000. Swine, 54,000,000 in the United States; a million and a half in Argentina. I have not the figures for the number of goats in the United States, but there are 4,000,000 of them in Argentina. I sometimes have wished we had more goats in this country, because some men devote their time principally—I say it with all courtesy and respect—in trying to find goats. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

In 1909 the United States produced 328,110,000 pounds of wool. In 1908 Argentina exported alone 351,076,000 pounds of wool, 23,000,000 pounds more than the total growth of this country. The United States produced 664,602,000 bushels of wheat in 1909 and exported 114,000,000 bushels. In 1908 Argentina exported alone, with her 6,500,000 people, 121,209,800 bushels of wheat, more by six and a half million bushels than the United States exported with her great area and her great wheat production.

There were in 1907, according to the latest statistics I can find, 8 freezing establishments in Argentina, 271 creameries, 18 butter factories, 68 cheese-making establishments, and 27 mixed factories. In 1908 Argentina produced 7,100,000 pounds of butter and 87,954,000 pounds of tallow. In 1908 Argentina exported animals and their products valued at $115,000,000, agricultural products valued at $241,000,000, and forest products valued at $6,000,000. Of sheepskins, in 1908, Argentina exported 53,000,000 pounds; of corn, 57,000,000 bushels; and of beef and mutton, 519,000,000 pounds. As I have stated, there are freezing establishments down there as well as packing establishments. I give my honorable colleague, the leader of the minority [Mr. MANN], as authority for the statement that the big Chicago packers already have branches in that country.

I do not know whether or not we can prevent their establishing freezing plants in Argentina, but I have heard the honorable Speaker of the House of Representatives and other gentlemen on the other side on a warm summer day draw their coats about them and say, "How cold I am," and then proceed to declaim for free wool. Gentlemen from Montana, Wyoming, Ohio, and other States, you are in a bad way now as to wool unless Texas saves you [applause on the Republican side]; and the Texas Representatives, I have always noticed, are pretty good watchdogs when it comes to matters affecting their State, and they have great ability.

Now, I will put in the RECORD some statistics touching Australia proper and New Zealand. The production of sheep and cattle in those countries is very great; also their exports of frozen meats.

Australia.

Area of Commonwealth	square miles	2,974,581
Population in 1908		4,275,306
Total area under crop	acres	9,892,393
Area under sown grasses	do	2,445,394
Cattle, 1908	number	10,543,012
Sheep, 1908	do	87,003,048
Swine, 1908	do	695,539

Total domestic exports of meat in 1908:

Beef, 40,712,000 pounds, valued at $2,197,500. Export price per 100 pounds, $5.40.

Mutton and lamb, 91,608,000 pounds, valued at $5,932,800. Export price per 100 pounds, $6.47.

New Zealand.

Area of New Zealand	square miles	104,751
Population		960,642
Total area under cultivation	acres	15,614,880
Area under sown grasses	do	13,623,528
Cattle in 1908	number	1,773,326
Sheep in 1908	do	23,373,220
Swine in 1908	do	245,092

Meat exported in 1908:

Beef (frozen), 39,099,984 pounds, valued at $2,040,888. Export price per 100 pounds, $5.22.

Lamb (frozen), 92,482,880 pounds, valued at $7,462,914. Export price per 100 pounds, $8.07.

Mutton (frozen), 90,406,848 pounds, valued at $5,333,066. Export price per 100 pounds, $5.90.

Number of freezing and preserving works in New Zealand in 1906 was 56.

In Argentina and in Australia they can pack the frozen meats—beef and mutton—at a less cost than they can be packed for in the United States, and they can be shipped to the United States by water at a less cost than they can be shipped from Chicago to New York. And yet it is proposed to put meats on the free list by this bill. For what? Oh, to repair the great crime and injustice that is done to the farmer by letting live animals on the hoof come in free from Canada. You then turn around and try to prove that there are not a great many live animals up there in Canada anyway.

You inveigh against the Republican Party. How you flap your wings and crow! We have been relegated to a minority and destroyed. You have not killed us individually, but we have been relegated to the minority. The people have made you the guardians of the fold. Gentlemen will recollect the old fable of Æsop, where the wolves went to the sheep and said, "Discharge the dogs, and we will protect you." [Laughter.] Well, I expect you will protect the sheep to your own satisfaction, but the protection will be in spots. [Laughter.]

Now, I might go through the pending bill step by step and point out its inconsistencies and false foundation in each particular, but the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], my honored colleague, covered the matter fully, and I will only refer, perchance, to one or two other items.

Let us take agricultural implements. The President has said, "I tried my best to get complete free trade with Canada, but Canada would not consent." And, as I pointed out a few days ago, the prime minister of Canada congratulated his brethren because, as he said, "We get our natural products into the United States free, but save our manufactured products by reserving protection against such products of the United States." Agricultural implements form a very considerable part of our exports to Canada. Anthracite coal is admitted into that country from the United States free; the same is true of bituminous coal; and we sold to Canada last year, notwithstanding the preferential duty that is given the mother country—Great Britain—$75,000,000 more of products than all the world sold to her and at a less ad valorem duty. But you put agricultural implements from all the world on the free list because, by the reciprocity agreement, there is a tax levied on agricultural implements reciprocally between the United States and Canada. Do you suppose you are going to fool anybody with that? Under existing law the duty on agricultural implements coming into the United States is 15 per cent, with a provision that no duty shall be charged on agricultural implements imported from countries which admit American agricultural implements free.

Great Britain gives us a free market for our agricultural implements, and we give that country a free market here for her agricultural implements. Argentina imposes duties on our agricultural implements, yet we sell large quantities in that market, notwithstanding the payment of duty; but under this bill products from Argentina—wheat, meats, and so forth—come into our markets free, without any condition being made that she shall remove her duties on our products exported to the Argentine. Yet you say you are for reciprocity. I wonder if you understand what it means. It is not something to cheat with, conjure with, or to deceive with. It is not something with which to presume upon the ignorance of a people competent for self-government. Nevertheless—and I speak with all due respect for you individually, though not so much respect for you collectively—you lift up your voices and cry aloud, proclaiming the alleged virtue and benefit of your action. I infer that you do so on the supposition that if you make a great deal of noise and reiterate the same thing time and time again it will lead some of the people to say that it must be so because of the noise and the repetition. There are other considerations involved in this matter. There is the question of print paper.

I could not file my affidavit in this respect, but I believe as firmly as I believe that I stand here, and if I had to risk my soul's salvation on the correctness of guessing right I would not alter my statement, that the secret reciprocity agreement with Canada never would have been made had it not been for the demands of the great publishing interests of this country. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Did you gentlemen on the other side get a letter this morning from the chairman of the committee on paper of the Publishers' Association? [Laughter on the Republican side.] The publishers, including the Associated Press, got together at a great banquet at the Waldorf-Astoria in New York a few days ago. It is a good thing for men to get together and exchange ideas. The President of the United States was there, and, in substance, exhorted the publishers, including members of the Associated Press, to be constant in effort and insistent in promoting public sentiment in favor of the Canadian reciprocity pact and of the bill to carry it into effect, urging that it be passed speedily without amendment.

Well, if it were not such a serious matter, I would say, without intending to be funny and with great respect for the present Chief Magistrate, that if he ever ceases to be President—and we will never elect a man to serve more than eight years in the Presidency [laughter and applause]—if he should be out of a job, he would make a great success as a humorist. That exhortation in New York is a fine specimen of high-class humor. [Laughter.] It discounts Mark Twain and all the other humorists. Oh, be ye constant! Be ye diligent! Persevere! [Laughter.] The bill has passed the House. Have it pass the Senate and become a law! [Laughter.]

Then, he said the farmers need not be afraid of it, and if it did turn out badly it could be repealed. [Laughter on the Republican side.] I want to read just a line——

Mr. ESCH. Will the gentleman read the Norris letter?

Mr. CANNON. Yes; I will read the letter. Here it is:

AMERICAN NEWSPAPER PUBLISHERS' ASSOCIATION,
903 Pulitzer Building, New York, May 5, 1911.

Hon. JOSEPH G. CANNON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: At the annual meeting of the American Newspaper Publishers' Association held in New York April 27, 1911, the following resolution was adopted, and I have the honor to transmit it herewith for your information:

"The American Newspaper Publishers' Association in annual meeting assembled at New York City respectfully urges the United States Senate to pass speedily and without amendment House bill 4412, known as the reciprocity bill."

A little more is added:

It also urges the abolition of import duties upon print paper, when made from free wood, wherever found.

Yours, truly,
JOHN NORRIS,
Chairman of Committee on Paper.

Now, what does that latter part mean? It means that the great quantity of pulp timber in Canada—and I get my information as to the quantity from my colleague [Mr. MANN], who was chairman of the special committee to investigate the print paper and wood-pulp matter—is on what is known as the "Crown lands," and I am informed that, with the exception, perhaps, of Quebec—and I am not sure as to that Province—you can not buy wood pulp or the timber from which wood pulp is made anywhere in the great bulk of the forests of Canada without paying a license and an export duty. Whether there is any considerable amount of free lands in Provinces like Ontario, I do not know; but I understand from the same authority, Representative MANN, that there is not a great amount of them.

I think the so-called reciprocity agreement, so far as lands producing wood pulp and the timber from which the wood pulp is made are concerned would be applicable and effective as to portions of Alberta and Saskatchewan and the great Canadian northwest; but practically that supply is not much nearer to us than Alaska—scarcely as near as the Pacific coast—and wood pulp is not brought from Alaska or the Pacific coast because the transportation charges, as I am informed, prohibit, and it can not therefore on account of the cost of the transportation compete with wood-pulp timber in more eastern sections.

Are you going to hold another caucus and amend this free-trade bill because of the facts stated? I have read the act of the British Parliament called the British North America Act, which is the constitution of Canada, and as nearly as I can ascertain each Province, certainly as to the Crown lands, and, as definitely as I can determine, as to the privately owned lands, can levy an export tax on wood-pulp timber. Even if there be private lands in Ontario upon the products of which an export tax can not be levied, still on the products of the great bulk of the Crown lands such a tax can be laid.

Yet under the reciprocity pact the United States, with its vast forests on the Pacific coast, in Alaska, and the South, where there is untold raw material for print paper, can not ship one pound of paper into Canada free; but you were in such haste to ratify the agreement and perpetrate this and other great acts of injustice upon the American people that you rushed the bill through and would not allow it to be amended in any particular.

This free-trade bill, in form and substance, is made to fool the people; and I say to you now that it would not be a violation of the biblical inhibition against idolatry to fall down and worship this piece of legislation, because it is unlike anything in the heavens above or the earth beneath or the waters under the earth. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. CANNON. I will yield in a moment.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. I simply wanted to ask this one question——

Mr. CANNON. I would rather the gentleman would ask the question at the close of what I have to say. I want to say to the gentleman that a fly can be embalmed in amber and, while it is the end of the fly, it will always be there. So, speaking respectfully, and not comparing my friend's question to a fly, by any manner of means—for I have great respect for him and for his ability—I would rather, until the close of my speech, not have it ornamented by suggestions that might not be to the point.

I would vote as cheerfully to protect American industries, whether cotton mills, woolen mills, or anything else, in Georgia, in South Carolina, in North Carolina, in Louisiana, and in Texas, as I would those of my own State. I have no desire to hurt Texas by having cattle and sheep from Mexico come over the border free, but if meat comes over the border free, then the cattle should come free. You have got to take this American system as a whole. I never have rejoiced, and never will, at the adversity of any part of your country and of my country.

It is strange how we sometimes talk about the interest of the farmer and the interest of the railroad man and the interest of the factory man as though they were diverse. Mr. Chairman, no man lives to himself. The interest of one individual or of a great number of individuals engaged in any industry becomes the interest of every other American citizen. A man said to me a day or two before the reciprocity bill passed, "Mr. CANNON, are you going to vote for the free-trade bill?" I said, "I will not answer now; I want first to sleep. I am greatly outraged; I do not like the abandonment, in part, of the protective principle; I will wait and sleep." The next morning I saw him, and I said, "Yes; I will vote against the free-trade bill," and he asked, "How can you defend such a vote?" Who consumes the farmer's products? Ninety or 95 per cent of his products are consumed in the United States by people who are not farmers. When you lessen the farmer's price, you lessen his purchasing capacity as a consumer, and when his purchasing capacity as a consumer is lessened, the man who makes the product which the farmer buys goes out of employment or works on a decreased wage.

Therefore, even though following a mistaken and false economic policy, you inflict complete free trade upon my great constituency and upon one-third of the people elsewhere in the country, I will grin and bear it, because, thank God, every two years there is an appeal to the people, and every four years, with a just and enduring and wise public sentiment, a majority of the people of this country can change a policy when they discover that they have made a mistake. Therefore, I will keep the Republican faith, and trust that as little harm as possible will be done to the two-thirds of the people not engaged in agriculture. God knows the harm will be great enough, and it is coming swift-footed already.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes more to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, to show what is going on in this country I read a clipping from the financial column of the New York Sun, published April 23, 1911:

> The pay of railway employees in particular was raised last fall upon the plea that living expenses in the land had so increased as to make this additional pay absolutely required. But living expenses have now decreased. A fall of unusual character has occurred in the price of eggs, butter, meat, wheat, and in the majority of the necessaries of life. Why, therefore, should not the cost of labor decline also? And why do not the labor unions themselves see that a reduction of pay schedules which would allow the body of laboring men to be kept at work is a better thing for the members of their organizations, taken as a mass, than for pay schedules to be kept up but with only a limited number of men employed?

Oh, it is said, "There is no danger; we are not going to wreck and ruin." They tell us that the banks are full of money, and they point out how cheap the rate of interest is. Yes; and we know the secret of it is that men who lead in production will not borrow money to produce, for they have no assurance of customers, and, consequently, production is from hand to mouth. If this Congress sits until the snow flies—and no one knows whether it will or not; it is all up to you gentlemen on the other side—disaster will follow disaster, because people are apprehensive and the farmer, with the same fixed charges to meet, having lost, on the average, one-fourth of the price he was receiving last November for his product, facing the necessity for retrenchment and being somewhat fearful, is buying less and less.

You may say that the Republicans are responsible for it; that if from the time of Lincoln down to the present hour we had not followed the protective policy, which has made the United States far and away the greatest producing nation of all of the nations of the earth, there would not have been any trouble. That may be; but if America had not been discovered and settled no one would be here but the Indians.

By 1913 I apprehend the minority will be on the other side of the Chamber; and if I keep my health, as I hope to do, I expect to help treat the minority with courtesy and respect. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] Under no circumstances can I conceive of that happening being delayed beyond 1915. As the old negro preacher said at the end of his sermon:

> Thar will be divine sarvices in this house two weeks from next Lord's Day, Providence permitting; three weeks, nohow.

[Laughter.]

So I say 1915, anyway. But what is the use of prophesying? I merely do so to offset the prophecies of gentlemen on the other side, and yet I have an abiding faith as to what will happen.

In conclusion, my Republican friends, I want to say I lost my temper over this reciprocity pact. I felt outraged, I felt indignant, and without desiring to abuse anybody personally I felt that those who represent substantially two-thirds of the people were willing to sacrifice the other one-third, at least temporarily, to answer a hysterical cry made by the demagogues and the Democrats and by the newspapers about the high cost of living when the necessaries of life were as cheap here as elsewhere in the world. [Applause on the Republican side.] I argued with them as best I could to stand four square to all the world and to keep the faith. I said that the proof of a pudding is in the eating of it, and after the country has paid the penalty arising from the application of Democratic policies—and the penalty is sure to be paid—it will return to correct legislation. I have said, and I want to repeat, gentlemen, that in my opinion we can not afford to forsake the faith because some of the brethren have temporarily become backsliders. Oh, after they take the penalty, as they will take it, between now and 1913, they will come back and ask the Republican Party and those who have kept the faith to hold a revival and open the doors of the church, and they will come in and get the good old economic religion and thank God that they are back in their father's house. [Loud applause.]

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL].

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Mr. Chairman, the protection of home industries by tariff legislation is not a logical or scientific system, and therefore college professors and bookmen adopt the side of free trade, which they can develop into a broad, comprehensive, beautiful, and consistent theory. On the question of tariff there are two classes of men who are entirely consistent and logical—those who would make the duties so high as to exclude all foreign competition with home productions and those who would throw our markets open to the competition of the world on equal terms. The overwhelming majority of this body may be classified between these two extremes. Many of them are trying to protect important industries in their districts and at the same time trying to lower duties on other imports in response to a general demand. In their efforts to do both and retain a semblance of consistency they are having a hard time.

This question has been on my mind and has given me much trouble, for I have been wrestling with myself on the question of consistency and fairness to all classes of our people—the farmers, manufacturers, and ultimate consumers. In the last session I paired for the Canadian reciprocity agreement, and this session I voted against it. These acts were inconsistent with each other and require an explanation to those who sent me here.

At the outset let me say that while I changed my vote I did not change my mind, because I had no conviction or even opinion on its merits when I paired for it in February. The fact that it was earnestly recommended by our great President and came to Congress as an administration measure meant much to me. Ultimate consumers promptly favored it, because they thought it would reduce the cost of living. The city press was for it, including the three Syracuse dailies. The Tariff Board report was not then published, and little or no information on the subject was obtainable. I went with Mr. ASHER HINDS, of Maine, to speak at a Lincoln anniversary celebration in Portland on the evening of February 13. We did not think it would be taken up for consideration during our absence, but to avoid taking any chance I paired for it, trying to justify myself with the argument that by so doing I was responding to the wishes of the majority of my constituents, who are consumers rather than producers of foods. The bill was reported to the House on the evening of Saturday, February 11, and on the following Monday it was taken up, very hurriedly considered, and passed Tuesday evening before my return. I can not say how I would have voted had I remained and heard the debate.

Now, having paired for the measure in February, why did I vote against it in April? I will tell you.

My disposition is quite stubborn and I am not anxious to change a position once taken, and would not have done so in this case were I not convinced that I could not fairly, consistently, and honestly defend it. Unless a man believes in himself and his attitude on any question he can not convince others or maintain his self-respect. After the bill was passed by the House the farmers of the country awoke and commenced to write and petition Congressmen to oppose it. Their arguments appealed to my sense of justice and fair play, and I was not able to answer or refute them even to my own satisfaction. I returned many answers to those who wrote me for and against the bill and to those who approved and condemned my vote, but in not one of them did I even attempt to defend it on the merits or justify my action, but did offer the excuse that a Congressman who represents a district part city and part country can not express the views of both elements when they are in direct conflict. I did not then expect another opportunity to vote on it and supposed I would have to stand on the record made, hence if there were any arguments which I could have honestly and conscientiously made in my defense I would not have remained silent.

The Federal Constitution provides that "all bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives, but the Senate may propose or concur with amendments as on other bills."

This is obviously a revenue bill, for it contains a schedule of dutiable articles as well as a free list. It did not originate in the House of Representatives, but in the executive department of the Government and was "submitted to Congress for its approval." It can not be amended by Congress, for it is claimed that changes would nullify the agreement. This is an extraordinary proceeding and an invasion of the functions of the legislative part of the Government.

But let us consider it on its merits, and let me quote from the tariff plank in the last Republican platform, which is the only authority or guide the party has on tariff legislation:

In all tariff legislation the true principle of protection is best maintained by the imposition of such duties as will equal the difference between the cost of production at home and abroad, together with a reasonable profit to American industries * * * the aim and purpose of the Republican policy being not only to preserve, without excessive duties, that security against foreign competition to which American manufacturers, farmers, and producers are entitled, but also to maintain the high standard of living of the wage earners of this country, who are the most direct beneficiaries of the protective system.

There has been much discussion on the relative cost of production of farm commodities on both sides of the border. Many figures and comparisons have been submitted from the report of the Tariff Board and other sources, which are embodied in the record. It seems to me the conclusion is clear that, with respect to cereals, hay, cheese, butter, and other farm products, the cost of production is less in Canada than in this country when you take into account the cost of labor and fertilizers, the higher value of American farms, and the larger yield on the Canadian side, because their lands are new and fresh and more productive. The conclusion is equally clear that the prices during some years back have been higher in the States than in the Dominion by from 5 to 20 per cent.

In President Taft's address before the members of the Associated Press and the American Newspaper Publishers' Association in New York on the evening of April 27 he stated that the Canadian reciprocity agreement would not injure the farmers or any particular class of people. If it will not injure the farmers, it will not help the city residents. Then why insist on a measure which will not help the ultimate consumers, which the farmers bitterly oppose, and which will cut off $5,000,000 of revenue? But I submit that the editors of agricultural papers and farmers' associations know quite as much about the cost of production and other conditions and prices on both sides of the border as does the President, and they are almost to a man against it because they believe it will hurt them.

My own judgment is that it will not hurt the farmers or help the city people as much as either party thinks, but that it will hurt the farmers much more than it will help the city consumers. Canadians will sell at the American prices as far as possible and will not "bear" the market if they can help it; and it is safe to say that for every $3 the farmers lose the city people will be lucky if they gain one, when the carriers, speculators, cold-storage men, middlemen, and ultimate purveyors to the ultimate consumers all get their profits.

Now, why should not the Republican platform on the tariff question be maintained and applied in behalf of the American farmers? Why should not their products be protected by duties equal to the difference between the cost of production in this country and Canada? Leave out the provision for reasonable profits.

I think it was a mistake to put it in the platform. For profits let them both depend on their energy and enterprise in running their farms. Since the enactment of the first tariff law the products of the farms as well as those of the factories have been protected. Why reverse that policy now, without investigation and without notice to the farmers? Why should our party pledge to the farmers be violated, while we seem inclined to maintain it as to other industries? Are they not discriminated against? Since wheat is put on the free list, why not flour? If the American farmer must sell his wheat in open competition with the Canadian, why not permit him to buy his flour in the same open market? If he must sell his steer in competition with the Canadian farmer, why not let him buy his meat on the same terms? Since barley is placed on the free list, why not malt? Since oats are placed on the free list, why not oatmeal, rolled oats, and other manufactured products of that grain? The various products of our flour manufacturers, meat packers, and malsters are protected. Our coal barons get better terms in this bill than in the Payne law. Wheat, barley, oats, potatoes, hay, butter, and cheese are the finished products of the farmers. Why should they not be protected? The average farmer considers these matters and believes he is being discriminated against. There is no industry in this country which should be encouraged as much as agriculture, for there is none as important in the life of the Nation and the welfare of its people.

I may be charged with undue sympathy for the farmer, but he is entitled to much consideration for what he has been through, and especially the New York farmer. I was raised on a small farm of rough land and have not forgotten the hard struggle we had to dig from the soil a scanty existence. I am also familiar with the conditions of country and farm life in central New York from the close of the war to the present time. Men who bought farms before the rebellion at low prices readily paid for them in a few years at war prices and in depreciated paper currency; but those who bought farms after the war and at war prices, and paid down all the money they had saved and gave mortgages for the balance, made bad bargains. They struggled for years and in a very hard, uphill pull, working late and early and economizing in every possible way, hoping for better times and striving to pay taxes and interest.

The prices of farm commodities continued to fall and they continued to grow poorer and poorer. Mortgagees, as a rule, did not wish to foreclose, for they knew they could not resell the lands for the amount of their liens; and they gave the title owners every opportunity to remain on the farms and pay what they could in the way of interest. Some pulled through and paid for their holdings, but many failed; and along in the seventies, eighties, and nineties were obliged to give up the struggle and surrender their farms without a dollar after many years of the hardest kind of work and the strictest economy. During that period their sons and daughters left the farms in despair and discouragement and sought employment in cities and industrial centers. Many farms were abandoned and have not been redeemed to this day. Not until the last 8 or 10 years have conditions improved for the farmers in our State. Lately the prices have been better, and while wages are higher farmers have been making a little money and enjoying more of the necessaries and comforts of life. According to the law of compensation, they are entitled to this prosperity of the last few years for their 30 years of hard times.

In a former period husbandry was the main occupation of our people, while now only about one-third of them are on the farms. That is a misfortune. It would be much better for the welfare of the country if a larger proportion of our people, men and women, were content to remain on the land. I can not criticize them for leaving, for I did the same thing. And yet I believe it would be wise policy on the part of the governments of the Nation and States to offer every reasonable encouragement and inducement to the agricultural interests. The Nation needs a sturdy yeomanry, such as only a happy, healthy country life can maintain, and a blow at our farmers would be a serious and far-reaching mistake.

The old Erie Canal from Albany to Buffalo was opened to navigation in the year 1826. It was a remarkable achievement for that time and a splendid monument to the foresight, courage, and enterprise of New Yorkers. It helped build up towns and cities along the line, and especially did it help Buffalo and New York. It gave the latter its great start toward the commercial supremacy which it has maintained to the present time.

But what effect did it have on our farmers? They paid their share of its cost, and very soon after its completion the rich, deep soil of the Mississippi Valley was opened up to cultivation and the canal furnished a cheaper means of transportation for the products of those lands to New York, Boston, and the consuming cities of the East. Our New York farmers were the losers both ways. They helped pay the freight and lost their markets. Later on the fierce competition with the New York Central lines, which extend from Albany to Buffalo parallel with the canal, made transportation on the canal unprofitable, and in 1882 tolls were abolished. Thereafter the State maintained the canal, the farmers paying their share, for the direct benefit of their western competitors. Again, in the nineties, New York spent $9,000,000 in deepening that ditch and additional sums for riparian damages caused by leakage, and the farmers paid their share for the benefit of their western business rivals.

A few years since our State bonded itself for $101,000,000 for the construction of a barge canal, which will float larger boats propelled by steam and provide cheaper transportation and tend to keep down freight rates on all lines to the Atlantic seaboard. That will benefit Buffalo and New York very much and the intermediate cities some. But it will injure our farmers by providing still cheaper transportation for the products of their western competitors. Not many of them voted for this appropriation, but they must pay their share.

Only a few years ago and after all the lands of this country available for homesteads without irrigation were taken up, and the farmers of our State were in hopes that the flood of immigration would turn backward to occupy and redeem the abandoned farms of the East, our National Government entered upon large reclamation and irrigation projects in the arid and semiarid regions of the Rocky Mountains, thus making more land available for cultivation and more competitors for our farmers. But there is a limit to the possibilities of irrigation, and now when the time has come toward which our farmers have been looking, when the equilibrium is fairly established between the producers and consumers of foods in this country, when they may get better prices for their commodities, it is proposed to let down the tariff bars all along the line between this country and Canada and subject them to free competition with an empire on the north whose virgin soil and low-priced lands and labor will make production of farm products much cheaper than in this country. Is it surprising that they should complain of unfair treatment and unjust discrimination? This reciprocity agreement, if enacted into law, will mean practically free trade to our farmers, because the Canadians are about their only competitors.

Why should our farmers' products be the first to be put on the free list? They are not in a combination. They can not create trusts or monopolies. There are too many of them and they are too poor. They must continue in a real genuine competition. Do the Canadian farmers contribute toward the maintenance of our Nation or State? Then, why should our markets be thrown open to them on equal terms while other industries in this country are being protected?

There is much juggling of figures and haggling as to the cost of production in this country and Canada. Let us reduce the proposition to simple form. No one questions that it costs more to produce some farm crops in this country than in Canada, and that the average prices are higher on this side of the border.

The farmers insist that the pledge in the Republican platform to protect them to the extent of that difference in the cost of producing those crops is a binding contract on the party and administration returned to office on that platform, and they further insist that that contract be kept. I can not conceive of any legal or equitable defense to their claim.

Again, 5,296,389 tons of paper of all kinds are produced annually in this country, of which New York State makes 1,117,557 tons. That is a large business and an important industry, and if it were in any of the smaller States, all the Representatives and the two Senators from that State would fight in its behalf regardless of party affiliations. But New York is so large in population and wealth and has so many great industries and activities that its Representatives in Congress seldom unite on any proposition for its benefit.

The Tariff Board appointed by President Taft, in a recent report, gives the following comparative statement of the cost per ton of the products of the following items in the United States and Canada:

	United States.	Canada.	Difference.	Payne duty.
Ground wood pulp	$14.78	$11.13	$3.65	$1.66
Sulphite pulp	32.72	27.34	5.38	3.33
News print paper	32.53	28.39	4.14	3.75

The present duty on print paper is only $3.75 a ton, and this report shows that it costs $4.14 more a ton to produce it in this country than in Canada. Will not these paper manufacturers and their employees be injured by the proposed agreement?

Why should not the protective principle as stated in our platform be recognized for the protection of the manufacturers of paper as well as those of other goods? Is this an unnecessary or disreputable business? Is there any reason why it should be discriminated against, except the fact that nearly all our magazine and newspaper publishers are demanding free print paper? The farm is a home and must be kept running even at a loss. Not so with paper and pulp mills. Their owners will not run them at a loss. They will reduce the wages of their employees or move their plants across the border, where the production of paper is cheaper. They are being sacrificed as a peace offering to a greedy and aggressive press.

When the Canadian reciprocity bill was before the House in February it stood alone; but in this Congress the situation is entirely changed. The Democrats are in control, with a majority of 67, and they seem to be fairly well organized and united.

Early in the session they reported to the House what is known as a free-list bill of articles required and used on farms, as a companion piece to the Canadian reciprocity bill and as a compensation to farmers for depriving them of protection. It is bad in many ways. It would open our markets to the free admission of those goods from Germany, France, and other manufacturing countries, while their ports are closed to our products of the same kind, except on payment of tariff duties. It would reduce the employment of our workmen and deprive our Treasury of about $10,000,000 annually, and would not materially lower the price to our people. Among other things it includes all farming implements, bagging for cotton, burlaps, boots and shoes, and salt, the producers of which in our country are crying out against this proposed legislation. I shall have to vote for this bill as an entirety. Shall I vote to put salt on the free list? The time was when the salt industry was the most important one in Syracuse. The location of our city was determined by the discovery of brine on the shores of Onondaga Lake. I remember when the boiling of salt was a profitable business, when the upper end of the lake was surrounded by salt blocks, all smoking and steaming, day and night, and each valued at about $10,000.

But the Wilson-Gorman free-trade law destroyed the fine-salt part of that industry, and this proposed law would finish what is left of the coarse-salt business. You may say, "Let it go; there is not much of it left." Well, I do not feel quite that way about it. It gave Syracuse its start in prosperity and progress, until it is now a large and enterprising business center.

Woodman, spare that tree!
Touch not a single bough!
In youth it shelter'd me,
And I'll protect it now.

Yet, had I voted to compel farmers to sell in a free-trade market and now vote to compel them to buy what they need on their farms in a protected market, that action would be so one-sided and unfair that I could not go home and look a farmer in the face.

The Democratic majority in the House exultingly approved the Canadian pact as a Democratic measure and a part of their program. They said it was a step, and only a short step, in the right direction, and that it would be followed by many other bills to the same effect. It seemed to me that I was at the fork of the roads, with two ways open—either to go with the Democrats and vote for their program or return to the Republican platform—and I chose the latter course.

The twenty-ninth New York district has at all national elections since the war indorsed the Republican Party and the protective policy by large majorities. In November, 1908, President Taft carried Onondaga County by a plurality of 10,573 votes and Madison County by a plurality of 2,493 votes on the tariff platform above quoted, and I was elected on the same ticket and bound by the same pledge. There are many reasons why it has been and is a reliable protection stronghold. In former times the salt industry was relatively very important, and it needed and received protection in the tariff acts. That tended to develop protection sentiment. The growing of tobacco in the northern and western parts of Onondaga County has been profitable; likewise the cigar-making and tobacco-manufacturing industries in Syracuse. In the southwestern part of the county the growing of teazles was quite extensively followed.

In the northern part of the county willow osiers are grown, and in Liverpool the making of baskets is a permanent industry. Madison County is a hop-growing locality, and there are in the district quite important and extensive deposits of gypsum, all of which have been protected in Republican tariff acts. Syracuse has grown and prospered very largely on its manufacturing industries, the products of many of which have been, and are, on the list of protected articles. On account of these special industries, as well as the general ones in which our people are engaged in common with other parts of the State and country, the majority of our citizens, employers and employees alike, have again and again declared in favor of a protective policy.

Years ago prohibitive duties were advocated and levied, in many cases, on the theory that if we excluded foreign goods new industries would be created and developed at home and that healthy and real competition between American producers would keep the price down, and even reduce it below that of the importer. That was generally true, and that policy continued to give general satisfaction until our home manufacturers ceased to compete and entered into gigantic combinations and created trusts and monopolies by which they could extract from the people unreasonably high profits. The effect of their avarice and greed is to make the tariff policy under which we have so remarkably prospered less popular with the consuming public, and there is a growing disposition to reduce the duties on articles of general consumption. But that should not be done in a haphazard manner, and only after careful and thorough investigation of the facts. When American producers of a given article cease to compete in the open market, but organize into combinations to control the output and raise the price beyond what is required for a reasonable profit it may be well to lower the duty or remove it altogether on that article, in the hope that foreign competition may relieve our consumers from extortion. However, in such legislation care should be exercised that honest manufacturers and fair-dealing people should not be ruined and that the innocent should not suffer with the guilty. You would not drown the dog to kill the fleas or burn the tavern to destroy the cockroaches.

Right here it should be remembered that there is no monopoly in this country in agricultural products. Then why commence on the farmers with hostile legislation? Why put their goods on the free list while monopolies are allowed to go unchecked?

President Taft said in his message:

I do not wish to hold out the prospect that the unrestricted interchange of food products will greatly and at once reduce their cost to the people of this country.

Then why this extraordinary method in tariff legislation, without any investigation of the facts and without giving the people whom it will most affect a hearing? What was the pressing need of it? Why was it not recommended to Congress by a general or special message, in the regular manner, so that it could be considered in the ordinary way as a separate piece of legislation or as a part of a general tariff bill? He contends that it will increase trade between the two countries, and says:

The entire foreign trade of Canada in the last fiscal year, 1910, was $655,000,000. The imports were $376,000,000, and of this amount the United States contributed more than $223,000,000. The reduction in the duties imposed by Canada will largely increase this amount and give us even a larger share of her market than we now enjoy, great as that is.

Let us see. The total imports were $376,000,000. A fair estimate of the Canadian imports of things that are not grown or produced in this country is about 30 per cent of the total imports, or $112,800,000. That leaves $263,200,000 of Canadian imports of a kind of goods produced in this country. Of this we have already $223,000,000, which leaves only $40,200,000, less than 11 per cent, to be divided among all the other nations. That is about as large a proportion of her trade as we could reasonably expect, when it is remembered that she gives Great Britain a preferential of 30 per cent. True, if we throw our market of 92,000,000 people, the best in the world, open to Canadian agricultural products and her farmers get better prices on that account, they may be able to buy more of our manufactured goods.

But that is too high a price to pay for a little trade. That may be Democratic reciprocity, which is free trade, but it is not and never was Republican reciprocity. The principle of protection is the placing of an import duty on an article, the same or similar to one produced in this country, for the protection of the home producer, while reciprocity, as expounded by Blaine, McKinley, and Dingley, is the reduction or removal of import duty on an article produced in a foreign country and not in this, in case that country makes the same concession with respect to an article produced in this country and not in that. Therefore, of necessity, reciprocity must be in noncompetitive articles.

Speaking on this subject, President McKinley said in his 1897 inaugural address:

The end in view always to be the opening up of new markets for the products of our country by granting concessions to the products of other lands that we need and can not produce ourselves and which do not involve any loss of labor to our people, but tend to increase their employment.

Most people are selfish, and city residents, on first blush, were inclined to favor this Canadian pact in the hope that it would reduce the cost of living. That is denied by its advocates and apologists. But, for the sake of argument, admit that it will; what will be the result? First, it will injure the agricultural business, and the farmers will not be able to buy as liberally from the merchants. That loss will be felt by employers and employees alike. The cultivation of the soil is the largest industry in this country, and the one on which all others depend for support. When farmers are doing well, general prosperity prevails. When their business is unprofitable and depressed, every line of manufactures, trade, and commerce suffers. Second, if they are deprived of protection, think you they will consent to the protection of the manufacturers? If they are forced onto a free-trade basis, how long will they submit to protective duties on commodities they buy? They are neither angels nor idiots, and are quite well organized. What is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander.

It is a very shortsighted policy which would lead manufacturers who are receiving good prices for their goods, and employees who are getting good wages for making them, to deprive the farmer of his protection. Will they not reciprocate by depriving the manufacturers and mechanics of their protection? The inevitable result will be the inauguration of a reign of free trade or tariff for revenue only. If that is what the country wants, the enactment into law of the reciprocity agreement is the surest and quickest way to accomplish it.

Every Congressman is in receipt of letters and telegrams from manufacturers of articles contained in the farmers' free-list bill protesting against its enactment into law. Their first and principal argument is that, if they are deprived of their present protection and thrown into free competition with the cheap labor of Europe and Asia, they will have to close their shops or reduce the wages of their employees. If they are for the Canadian reciprocity agreement their pleas are unreasonable and one sided.

I was interested in the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HARRIS]. It was an eloquent and pathetic plea for the boot and shoe manufacturers of the country in general and for his own State and district in particular. The following is a cross section of his speech:

With Germany and France and Canada imposing duties on boots and shoes, with these countries equipped with the same machinery that our own people have, copying the style and methods, gaining in efficiency in the use of our most approved machinery, and with a wage rate only about half of ours, can we expect to benefit the boot and shoe worker by putting his product on the free list?

If these facts are true, you can not, and if the wage rate in Canada is only about half of ours, how can our paper and pulp manufacturers and their empolyees compete with the Canadians, whose forests are extensive and convenient and whose water powers and other facilities for production are as good as ours; and how can our farmers and their hired men compete with the Canadians, whose lands are new and fresh and more productive than ours, very much cheaper, and practically unlimited in extent?

Yet Mr. HARRIS voted to put print paper and farm products on the free list, and asks other Republicans to vote against the same treatment for boots and shoes. He is a new Member, fresh from the people, from the Brocton district which elected Governor Foss to Congress about a year ago, and represents what is known as "the Massachusetts idea" of reciprocity, which is bristled to the snout, and demands the right for Massachusetts to buy in a free-trade market and sell in a protected market. That was the idea which coerced all the Republicans from his State but one to vote for the Canadian pact.

If employers and employees in the shops whose business is made profitable by protection cry out against the removal of the duties on their goods, why should they not stand for protection on farm products? If they could sell in a protected market and buy in a free-trade market they would like it; but that can not be. Either the protective principle must be maintained, and people must continue to give as well as take, or the whole protective system under which our country has been so prosperous during the last 40 years will fall to the ground. If public sentiment is growing so strong against protective duties that a majority of the people are determined to remove them altogether, it should be done by degrees. If we are up on stilts, it would be well for our safety to get down gradually. If the tariff rates on farm products are unduly high, and they are on most things, reduce them gradually, and likewise scale down the duties on the things that farmers buy and use on their farms. That would be not only the fair, but the safe course to pursue.

It would be a serious mistake to cut off all protection from competitive articles by one enactment or in a single year. Business depression would surely follow, and poor men and women who have no provision for the future and live from day to day on their daily wage would be the greatest sufferers. Experienced business men realize the danger, and just before the vote was taken on the bill we were flooded with telegrams and letters from manufacturers and business houses throughout the country advising us to vote against it, not that the reciprocity agreement would injure them directly, but because they feared its ultimate effect on the business of the country.

Already business is feeling the bad effect of this tariff tinkering, and conservative business men, who do not know what is coming, are preparing for the worst by keeping close to the shore and reefing their sails for a possible storm.

An analysis of the vote on the bill may be of interest. Notwithstanding the influence of the President and the press, only 66 out of 160 Republican Representatives voted for it. Seventy-eight voted against it and 16 did not vote. Thirteen out of 15 votes from the three southern New England States were cast for it, 1 against it, and 1 Member did not vote. Out of 22 from Pennsylvania, 14 were for it and only 5 against it. The great iron and steel industries of that State were not disturbed, and coal has more favorable terms under this agreement than under the Payne law. It received 16 additional votes from great city districts, leaving 23 which were picked up throughout the country.

There are 14 States bordering on Canada, or the boundary waters, from Maine to Washington. It is safe to say that the farmers of those States are better acquainted than those farther south with the actual conditions on either side of the border, including the wages of labor, the value of farm lands, the average yield per acre, the cost of production, and the prevailing prices of staple farm products. It is obvious that they would come into more immediate and direct competition with Canadian farmers and suffer more from free trade in farm products than would their neighbors toward the south. There are 73 Republicans in this Congress from those 14 States, of whom only 21 voted for the reciprocity agreement, and of those 21, 13 are from large city districts, leaving only 8 from mixed districts who voted for it. These figures would seem to indicate that the farmers are quite generally and earnestly opposed to this measure, and it would further seem that their protests should be respected.

I could, perhaps, have avoided a record vote, but wanted to correct my mistake in the last session. I was well aware that the city newspapers of the country were back of this measure, and expected they would condemn my action, and was not surprised when the Syracuse dailies joined in the "anvil chorus." However, it should not be forgotten by the readers of newspapers that they are directly and selfishly interested. They want free print paper, that they may buy it cheaper.

The American people are their audience every morning and evening. They know their power and others know it, and they have used it to the limit. They have determined to coerce the Government and the party to violate its solemn pledge by removing the duty on what they buy. Newspaper and magazine publishers are now especially favored by the Government, which is suffering an annual loss of many millions of dollars on second-class mail matter for their benefit.

The present duties on wood pulp, sulphite pulp, and print paper are not excessive for revenue purposes, yet they are not willing to contribute a little toward the support of the Government, while the poor man pays a tax of about 80 per cent on the sugar consumed by his family. Most of them are doing good business and making fair profits on their investments and have prospered under present conditions. But they are not satisfied. They are demanding that an exception be made for their profit in the general tariff policy.

On the other hand, I had no possible interest in opposing the Canadian pact. It would have been much pleasanter to accommodate the President and much easier to drift with what Syracuse newspapers say is the prevailing opinion in our city. I was very reluctant to draw the fire of the Syracuse press or provoke the adverse criticism of Syracuse people who, in common with all others, would like to buy what they consume in the cheapest market and sell what they produce in the dearest market. Nor was I unmindful of the fact that the majority of my constituents reside in that city, but I do not believe they would have asked me to violate the pledge on which I was seven times elected, nor do I think they would have urged me to support that measure if they believed, as I do, that it is the first blow of a general and indiscriminate assault upon the protective system. Many of them remember what happened the last time that was tried.

There are in the Nation several all-city and perhaps no all-country districts. The great majority of them are mixed. In one there is a majority of urban population and in the next a majority of agricultural people. In such cases a Representative can not express the views of both if they are in direct conflict. Then, should he, in determining his action on a great far-reaching national question like this, be guided only by a count of the people or votes in the country and city portions of his district, and side with the majority? Should he pay no attention to the merits of the proposition? Should he assume that city people would approve an act which is unjust to their rural neighbors? I think not. This measure is, in my judgment, discriminatory, unjust, unfair, and indefensible. My former action had the commendation of the interested newspapers, but that did not satisfy my judgment or conscience. I could not deceive myself, because it did not seem right. In opposing the Canadian agreement I voted with the majority of my party, in obedience to the pledge on which I was elected and against a measure which, if enacted into law, will, I very much fear, precipitate such a radical and reckless revision of our tariff schedules as to bring on a period of industrial depression and hard times from which city people will suffer more than the farmers.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM].

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, just to your north, and, in fact, surrounding you on all sides save one, is a State, though small in area, blessed with a history for deeds done and works achieved that could well be the envy of her larger and more powerful sisters of this great Union. Maryland, though less than 240 miles in length and less than 125 miles in width at its widest portion, is inhabited by a people of many occupations, many professions, many trades, and many lines of employment. Extending, as she does, from the shores of the Atlantic Ocean to the peaks of the Allegheny Mountains, embracing in her limits that magnificent Chesapeake Bay, one of the largest bays in the very world itself, blessed by many navigable rivers giving access to ships from various parts of the world and connected with the remotest parts of the Continent by great trunk lines, is calling upon this Congress to lessen the burden of taxation levied indirectly, but most surely, upon her people who have for so many years borne the burden with patience and who would again be willing to take up the burden should circumstances and the necessities of the country demand it.

Coming, as I do, from the great city of Baltimore, on the shores of the Patapsco River, that noble river where at Fort McHenry the British were repulsed in the War of 1812 and the Star Spangled Banner was born, you will naturally suppose that I am primarily interested in placing upon the free list those things so needful to the residents of large cities; those things which go to cheapen the cost of living; those things which go to feed the thousands of people living within the confines of Baltimore in particular and the State of Maryland and country at large in general, and such is the case.

There is great uneasiness throughout the land; the people have so long heard the boast of prosperity and progress; they have so long heard of the great riches of our land and of the fact that we are the greatest people and the richest people on the globe; they have viewed with wonder and admiration the building of great libraries throughout the land, the endowment of universities and colleges, the wealth of the great railroads which gird the country with iron bands, uniting cities and States and carrying millions of people; steamships, the like of which was never dreamed of by our ancestors, giving comfort and convenience such as even Solomon in all his glory perhaps did not enjoy; on every side they behold swift and magnificent automobiles carrying ladies clad in raiment the raw material of which must have been gathered from the four corners of the world; at the great expositions and factories they stand, viewing with amazement the machinery, which seems to do its work with such neatness and accuracy but with such dispatch that they can hardly realize that it has not the brains of man within for its guidance and control; on the farms they behold the great steam plows preparing the soil, the self-binder or the machine which cuts, thrashes, and bags the grain for shipment; in the abattoir they notice that the meat is hardly handled before it lands in the great cold-storage vaults of the meat combine, and nothing lost except the squeal; they hear great orators tell of how by modern machinery one man can do the work of many and the cost of production is thereby lessened, and they go home and in the recesses of their domiciles begin to wonder why it is, with this great country endowed with resources and wealth as Providence never endowed one before, with a people intelligent and able and willing and ready to work, that they, the toilers and producers, the bone and sinew of the land, find it so hard, so burdensome, and so laborious to even get enough food and cheap raiment to feed and clothe those dependent upon them.

What is the answer? Evidently a cog is loose somewhere and something must be wrong, and so they have turned to the Democratic Party to furnish relief—that party which has so long stood for the masses as against the classes, and whose time-honored and historic principle has ever been "Equal rights to all and special privileges to none," and which should be to all its chosen representatives their constantly heeded guide in all legislation of whatsoever kind; that party which believes that the taxing power given by the Constitution to the National Government was intended for the production of revenue sufficient to run the Government economically administered and not for the purpose of granting special privileges to the few at the expense of the many.

It is not true to say that the disquietude among our people arises from the ordinary differences existing because of thrift or indolence, but it is true that this condition exists because those against whom these inequalities operate are conscious of the fact that the Government has not protected them in their rights and has given special advantages to others against them.

The undeniable results of this unjust administration of government are accomplished in the main by the consolidation of the various enterprises of the country under one central control popularly designated as trusts, combines, or monopolies and their encroachment upon the welfare of the people because of the Government's acts of omission or commission regarding them; having a well-nigh universal control of the vast producing, manufacturing, and industrial enterprises of the country, and being protected by a high prohibitory tariff, have it within their ability on the one hand to create and maintain exorbitant selling prices of trust-controlled products and thereby to produce an excessive cost of the necessities of life and living through the land, and on the other hand to force a low selling price of materials and products needed for trust productions; to limit the extent of productions; to control the volume of remunerative employment and thereby establish the compensation of the employed.

That they exercise this ability is fearfully brought home to the people; to the consumer, in the remarkable increase in the cost of that which he consumes; to those whose only means of a livelihood is in employment, by the difficulty in securing employment; to the employed, by the difficulty that they have in maintaining a living rate of wages; and to those who are compelled to sell their products to the trusts, in the struggle to get for them reasonable living prices.

This ability to control the market for that which it buys and that which it sells, and arbitrarily to dominate production, the volume of employment, and the rate of wages gives to the trusts the power and opportunity of exacting enormous profits as returns from these enterprises. Competition being annihilated, the only limit placed upon the tribute they exact is the patience of a long-suffering people and the amount of tariff duties levied by the Government on corresponding foreign products. The power of the trusts to control the amount of production leaves them free to produce only so much as can be sold in the domestic markets at such exorbitant prices as they choose to demand, subjected only to the competition of corresponding foreign goods plus the tariff on them. Then, the unerring conclusion that the higher the tariff duties on corresponding foreign products the higher the prices the trusts can compel the domestic consumers to pay for their products and the higher the cost of living.

Herein we have the reason why every one of these trusts, combines, and monopolies favor Republican principles and the Republican Party and opposes Democratic principles and the Democratic Party. One is their willing slave, guaranteeing to them in their national platforms reasonable profits at the expense of the consumer, bringing to them undeserved tribute wrung from the people by unjust legislation; the other they oppose as their enemy, because it would deny to them this tribute by maintaining just government.

The avowed purpose of the Republican policies is the protection of American industries and labor, by means of protective tariff duties imposed for this purpose as the governing principle, with the result that while it prevents foreign competition it operates, at the same time, to confine home products to the home markets, thus depriving American products of the opportunity of a larger foreign market and limiting production to the needs of home consumption.

When we remove this prohibitory tariff, which restrains the production and commerce of the country, there will be an enormously increased demand for the products of this country in the world market, creating a larger volume of remunerative employment and a greater demand for labor, which, I believe, is the only manner of increasing the rate of wages outside of labor organizations.

I believe there are two concurrent methods of correcting the glaring inequalities which are rapidly dividing the people of the country into two great classes—the enormously wealthy, who control the property of the country at will, and the dependent employed, who must be subservient to gain a living. One method is to enact and enforce legislation that will prevent trusts and combinations in restraint of manufacture, trade, and commerce, thus restoring and maintaining to all the opportunity of entering into industrial and commercial enterprises without the fear of being driven to bankruptcy by the machinations of the trusts.

The other method is to reduce the tariff duties to the necessities of the Federal Government economically administered, with the special purpose in view of so reducing the tariff on these products in which the trusts have a monopoly of the home market and depend upon excessive tariff duties to exact high prices from home consumers, and place upon the free list, as fast as necessary revenues will permit, those articles which will relieve our stomachs and backs from taxation.

The cost of manufacturing any given product depends in the main upon two controlling factors: First, the cost of the materials, and, second, the cost of the labor required to fashion them into the finished product.

The cost of labor to our manufacturers is at least 5 per cent less than the cost of labor to the manufacturer in England, the chief competing industrial nation of the world. The cost of materials for manufactured productions in our country is at least 45 per cent greater than the cost of such materials to the foreign manufacturer consequent upon the operation of tariff taxes and trust manipulations. With an advantage in the cost of labor and with a cost of materials less to them, because of the great natural resources of our country, our manufacturers could successfully meet the competition of the foreign manufacturers in the markets of the world; and this would be our industrial accomplishment and status were it not hindered and denied by the protective-tariff policy of the Republican Party in maintaining the high costs of materials. A reduction of tariff duties and a denial of the right of trusts to operate in restraint of trade, thus giving our manufacturers a cost of materials no greater than the cost of materials to foreign manufacturers, would unquestionably place our manufacturers in a position to make and sell their products in the markets of the world in a successful competition. Were they thus enabled to meet successfully the competition of the foreign markets, they most assuredly would be enabled, for the same reasons, to successfully meet that same competition in their own home market and make it impossible to flood the home market with foreign products, thus showing the absolute fallacy of this reason for refusing tariff reduction in accordance with the demands of the Democratic Party and the people.

Were it provided in the tariff laws that the wage earners in protected industries should receive, directly, their proportional part of the increased price of domestic products, caused by the increase in the tariff on corresponding foreign goods and trust manipulations thereunder, then the Republican Party might claim that the protective-tariff principle was a benefit and a necessity to wage earners; but as no such provision is made, or is possible, and as all of the benefit of the increased price of domestic products resulting from tariff duties goes into the coffers of the favored classes directly and none into the pockets of the wage earners, except through their generosity or concession, the fallacy of this reason is strikingly apparent.

No greater fallacy was ever imposed upon a credulous people than the one that the rate of wages is dependent in any way upon taxes levied upon imported products. The rate of wages paid to the wage earner depends absolutely upon the existing volume of employment and the number of wage earners available to perform work. The higher rate of wages generally prevailing in this country in manufacturing industries is produced primarily by the greater skill, efficiency, and productiveness of our wage earners, and which greater productiveness affords our manufacturers a lower cost of labor; and, second, by the efforts of labor organizations in temporarily increasing the demand for wage earners by voluntarily withdrawing from employment enough to maintain the higher rate.

The actual status of the wage earner under the present protective tariff is: If he gets any increase in his rate of wages, thereby the fund out of which he is to be paid goes first into the possession of his employer; there is no legal way of compelling his employer, who is most generally a trust, to pay it over to him, if he tries to collect his portion through his labor organizations he is met either with an injunction, the militia, or a discharge; that his cost of living is increased for his prosperity; economy in production has closed the door of innumerable factories; the limitations placed upon productions has lessened the number of working days in the year; and the ever increasing relative supply of wage earners to the demand existing under such conditions keeps his actual earning capacity at the lowest point and of uncertain duration. A reduction in the costs of the necessities of life, a reduction in the costs of materials used in manufacture, and an increase in the volume of production by reducing tariff duties, I believe, should be the sincere and untiring endeavor of every Democratic Representative in Congress. [Applause.]

The bill before us, known as the farmers' free-list bill, I feel is in line with these ideas and suggestions, giving, as it does to the farmers cheaper agricultural implements and cheaper material for the bagging or binding of his agricultural products; thereby lessening the cost to him of his goods when ready for market, which will therefore be sold to the consumer at a cheaper price; but not only does it take from the farmer these tariff taxes and give to him the chance to buy in his home market as cheap, and perhaps cheaper, than can the farmer of other countries who has heretofore been able to buy American-made goods cheaper than the American farmer could buy them at home.

The farmer is the great producer of that which keeps the body and soul together; he, during his season, is perhaps the hardest-worked individual we have in our land; it is to him that we owe our very existence; and yet under Republican tariff legislation he has received little or no relief and seldom much consideration, and why? Because he goes on with his great occupation, paying little heed to public life, content with his home and his family, and happy when he can meet his just obligations like an honest man and have enough remaining for his family's support and education. He does not expect great wealth and meddles little with the affairs of other men. He does not form combinations in restraint of trade or try to corner the market, but produces as abundantly as possible and goes forth with his goods to meet competition at home and abroad; but when he goes to buy he discovers that, by virtue of high tariff, he must pay such prices as demanded by the infant industries of which he has heard so much, but which have grown into giant monopolies which he no longer recognizes. Not alone, however, will he be benefited by removing the tariff from food products and lumber, but the laborer, the other man who produces and fashions into shape the wealth of the world, will be benefited in that his cost of living will be lessened and the material which goes into the construction of his home will no longer be subject to taxation and monopoly.

All Americans of whatsoever occupation must and will be aided by taking off that tariff which affects their stomachs by admitting free many commodities which go to feed the 92,000,000 inhabitants of our land.

Mr. Chairman, I am particularly anxious to see this bill become a law; it means so much to our farmers of both the North and the South; it means so much to the inhabitants of our cities who are crying out for cheaper foodstuffs, cheaper shoes and leather goods, and cheaper homes. They will believe that at last they have come into their own, that they, too, are to be considered in the legislation of our Government, and that the great wealth, the prosperity, and good things of this God-given country of ours are to be enjoyed by all alike, the rich and the poor, the great and the small; that no longer will the man who depends for his living upon the sweat of his brow be compelled to have a top to his market basket to prevent others from seeing how little he has been able to purchase with his hard-earned salary.

Then will they believe that the day is fast approaching when tariff taxes will be for revenue and not to create a favored class, with guaranteed profits. Then will the free list of the Republican Party, consisting of fossils, broken bells, junk, acorns, skeletons, divi-divi, apatite, teeth, and ipecac become a joke and the new free list announced by the Democratic Party, consisting of beef, mutton, and pork, cereals, lumber, sewing machines, salt, farming implements, shoes and other leather goods, will bring peace, happiness, and contentment to our people. No longer will there be the sound of broken bells, but harmonious and joyous bells, as depicted in Poe's beautiful poem; the teeth provided by the Republican free list will be kept busy enjoying the Democratic free list; apatite (appetite) of the Republican free list, so long unsatisfied, will be satisfied; and divi-divi, those words of the Republican free list whose meaning has so long been unknown to the consumers, will be interpreted by a Democratic Congress to mean "a square deal for all," when legislation and taxation in the interests of the few shall no longer exist, but all our people shall enjoy alike those blessings and good things so bountifully bestowed upon our land—the land of the free and the home of the brave. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN] for 30 minutes.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, when the general debate on this bill shall have ended, and the time shall come for amendments, if I have the opportunity I shall propose to amend by striking out, on page 3, in lines 4 to 12, inclusive, the following words, to wit:

> Beef, veal, mutton, lamb, pork, and meats of all kinds, fresh, salted, pickled, dried, smoked, dressed or undressed, prepared or preserved in any manner; bacon, hams, shoulders, lard, lard compounds, and lard substitutes; and sausage and sausage meats.
> Buckwheat flour, corn meal, wheat flour and semolina, rye flour, bran, middlings, and other offals of grain, oatmeal and rolled oats, and all prepared cereal foods; and biscuits, bread, wafers, and similar articles not sweetened.

If the above paragraphs were stricken out, the bill would include manufactured products which the farmers use, and therefore must purchase, and if the placing of these articles on the free list caused any reduction in the price of the articles, the farmers would reap the entire benefit of the legislation. I therefore plead with the Democratic majority, that controls the legislation in this House, to permit this bill to be amended as I have suggested.

The Democratic Party is certainly not committed to the policy of placing farm products or articles manufactured out of such products upon the free list. I have carefully examined the Democratic platform of 1908, and the only specific demand in that platform to place certain articles on the free list was made in the following paragraph:

> We demand the immediate repeal of the tariff on wood pulp, print paper, lumber, timber, and logs, and that these articles be placed on the free list.

Why, then, should the Democratic majority in this House, in the very first bill it presents in the revision of the tariff, place a long list of farm products on the free list? If it was a part of the Democratic policy to place our farmers in competition with the farmers of all other countries, why was this not clearly stated in the platform of 1908 and presented to the people in the congressional campaign of 1910?

The Republican platform of 1908 specifically declared in the tariff plank that the very object of its protective tariff policy was—> to preserve, without excessive duties, that security against foreign competition to which American manufacturers, farmers, and producers are entitled.

Farmers were specifically named with manufacturers and other producers.

So that, so far as the Republican doctrine is concerned, by our platform, by our party literature, by the legislation which the Republican Party has enacted during its entire history, the party stands committed to the policy of giving the farmer protection equal to the protection afforded to the manufacturer. [Applause on the Republican side.]

PROTECTION CORRECT POLICY.

For one, I believe in the policy of protection. I am willing to vote for any measure that guarantees ample protection to all home industries, to every section of our country, and to American citizens engaged in every lawful and legitimate business. Very recently this House passed what is known as the Canadian reciprocity bill. On the Republican side of this House this measure had the support of many Members who claim to be protectionists. It appears that the majority of the Republicans who voted for the Canadian reciprocity bill represent city congressional districts and districts in the East that contain large manufacturing interests which have received great benefits from the protective tariff policy. The gentlemen who supported the Canadian reciprocity measure all did so, of course, with patriotic motives, following their best judgment. But I can not agree with them.

If those who believe in protection and have within their congressional districts large protected interests desire that this protection shall continue, it would seem to be the part of wisdom on their part not to vote for any law or measure that will place the farmers in competition with the farmers of other countries. The difference in the scale of wages paid in the United States and other countries is the main argument used to show the necessity of protection. But this difference in wages applies to agricultural labor as well as to labor in the shops and factories. Manufacturing interests in the great cities should not ask or expect the farmers of the country to support a policy of protection that does not extend to them not only the indirect benefits of protection which all others share with them, but also the direct benefits which can only come by a tariff that will preserve to them the home market against competition which they can not meet without lowering the standard of living on the American farm.

The fact is, all our interests are mutual. Whatever benefits the 30,000,000 of people residing on our farms will benefit the 60,000,000 of people residing in the towns and cities. The farmers are likewise interested in the prosperity of the people in the cities. They are the farmers' customers. The farmers can not possibly prosper unless their customers are prosperous. Those who manufacture goods look to the farmers to buy them. The farmers can not buy liberally without they have the money. The farmers will not have the money if the people who are engaged in manufacturing, commerce, and trade are sending their means abroad to the farmers of foreign countries. The people in the cities who are looking to Canada, Mexico, South America, and Australia for cheaper food products should hesitate long before they enter upon a policy that in the end must recoil upon themselves and work injury to all.

As agriculture is the chief industry of Oklahoma, and as my constituents are largely farmers or those dependent upon the success of the farming interests, I shall attempt to show that this bill should be amended, as I have already indicated, by striking out the two paragraphs which relate to farm products. I am not discussing this bill from the viewpoint of the manufacturer or whether or not it violates the principle of protection, but I am considering it from the viewpoint of the farmers, because the authors of the bill call it the "farmers' free-list bill," and it should not go to the country under a fictitious name. It should not be paraded under false colors.

BOTH GAIN AND LOSS.

The bill under consideration places two classes of articles on the free list. One class includes certain manufactured articles in common use among farmers. Prominent among these are farm implements, boots and shoes, leather, harness, lumber, lath, shingles, barbed wire, and sewing machines. The other class includes articles manufactured out of products of the farm; among those may be mentioned beef, pork, mutton, veal, bacon, ham, flour, corn meal, bran, oatmeal, bread, cereal foods, and biscuits.

If we are to legislate in the interests of the farmer, there is only one way that we can do so, and that is to pass laws that will tend to reduce the prices of the things he buys and maintain or increase the prices of the things he sells. The farmer will receive no substantial benefit from any amendments to the tariff laws that will reduce the price of what the farmer buys and also reduce the price of what he sells. But the farmer will be benefited if our legislation tends to cheapen what he buys and increases the prices of what he sells. These propositions are self-evident.

The farmer does not, as a rule, sell beef, pork, mutton, bacon, ham, lard, flour, meal, oatmeal, cereal foods, and bread. But these things are made of cattle, hogs, sheep, wheat, oats, and corn—things the farmer does produce and things he must sell. You can not reduce the price of a manufactured article without reducing the raw material out of which the thing is manufactured. You can not reduce the price of beef, pork, mutton, bacon, ham, flour, meal, bran, oatmeal, cereal foods, and bread without reducing the price of cattle, hogs, sheep, wheat, oats, and corn. If the great meat-packing companies must sell their meats cheaper, they will pay the farmer less for his cattle, hogs, and sheep. If the millers sell their flour and meal at lower prices, they will pay the farmer less for his wheat and corn. If foreign beef, pork, and mutton are imported into this country, there will be so much less demand for the beef and pork and mutton manufactured out of the cattle, hogs, and sheep of the American farmer. If beef and pork and mutton and flour and meal and cereal foods can be produced cheaper in Canada, Mexico, South America, and Australia than in the United States, and these articles shall be imported in large quantities into the United States, then the prices here must be brought down to a level with the prices in these foreign countries.

BENEFITS UNCERTAIN.

How much our farmers would gain by placing farm implements, cotton bagging, cotton ties, leather, boots and shoes, fencing wire, lumber, sewing machines, and salt on the free list must, from the nature of things, be a matter of mere conjecture. It will all depend upon whether or not the removal of the tariff on these articles would materially reduce the price of these articles to the farmers. On the other hand, how much the farmer would lose by placing flour, meal, oatmeal, cereal foods, bread, and all kinds of meats on the free list is just as uncertain. This would, of course, depend upon the extent that these articles were imported from foreign countries, and what reduction this would make in the price of farm products which the farmers sell.

In trying to determine what benefits our farmers will get from this bill should it become a law, some things should be borne in mind. The placing of these manufactured products which the farmers buy upon the free list may not reduce the prices of such articles. The bill places farm implements on the free list. But farm implements are already on the free list, except to those countries which do not admit our farm implements free. The United States last year exported $28,000,000 worth of farm implements. Farm implements are now sold cheaper in the United States than in any country in the world. And it is well known that the present tariff does not and can not affect the prices of farm implements to any great extent.

The bill places bagging for cotton, sacks, burlaps, and so forth, on the free list. The total value of such articles consumed in the United States in 1905 was $26,031,644—$16,965,842 of this amount was imported. When the tariff is so low now that two-thirds of the amount consumed is imported the tariff can have but little, if any, effect on the price at which the article is sold.

The bill places boots and shoes, leather, harness, and saddlery on the free list. It is doubtful if placing these articles on the free list would reduce the price of these articles to the farmers to any great extent. The Payne-Aldrich tariff bill, enacted nearly two years ago, made a reduction in the tariff on boots and shoes from 25 per cent to 10 per cent. But it is certain that so far there has been no real reduction in the prices at which shoes are sold to individuals.

The bill places lumber on the free list. The Payne-Aldrich tariff bill reduced the tariff on common lumber from $2 per thousand to $1.25 per thousand feet. But two years have passed and we see no reduction in the retail price of lumber. Certainly no well-posted man believes free lumber will materially affect the prices which our farmers pay for lumber. Farmers must bear in mind that these manufactured articles included in this free list, such as are purchased by farmers, as a rule are manufactured by large corporations, well equipped in the business, and in a position already to compete with foreign competitors. Some of them have factories in foreign countries.

There is also a question as to who pays the tariff upon a competing article, or an article the like of which is produced in the country levying the tariff. Free traders claim the consumer pays the tariff. This has been proclaimed by tariff-for-revenue-only advocates from every stump in the land. Many who believe in a protective tariff assume that the consumer pays the tariff. But if this be true, why should the foreign manufacturer object to the tariff? The fact is the man who imports dutiable articles in this country pays the tariff at the customhouse, and that tariff is never returned to him. In the great majority of cases he does not add that to the price of his goods when sold in this country. The amount of the tariff is simply so much deducted from his profits. And if every customhouse of the United States were destroyed and the tariff wall was completely obliterated, the American consumers would not reap the bulk of the benefit, but foreign manufacturers would add to their profits the greater part of the $350,000,000 which they now annually contribute toward the support of our National Government. [Applause on the Republican side.]

But it is absolutely certain that the importer would not sell his product in this country at the price he sells it now, less the tariff he now pays. If this were true, the importer would have nothing to gain by this country removing the tariff from the imported article. The importer may sell in this market now all his goods, if he pays the duty. He is absolutely unrestricted in the amount he may sell in this country. If the tariff shall be removed, we must assume that the foreign manufacturer is something more than human if he does not appropriate to himself a large part of the tariff which he has been paying our customs officers. [Applause on the Republican side.]

WARNING TO FARMERS.

Farmers of the United States should realize that there is danger to them in having their products placed upon the free list, and in opening their markets to the products of other countries where lands are new and fertile and productive, where labor is cheap, and the standard of living is low.

It must also be remembered that the farmers are unorganized. From the nature of things the farmers can not organize, form trusts and combinations, and control their prices by arbitrary and artificial means. The lumber interests, the boot and shoe manufacturers, the corporations that manufacture bagging, sacks, burlaps, cotton ties, salt, and farming implements are all controlled by a few men. There are many ways by which they may modify their business, enter into new combinations, and, as a last resort, they may reduce the prices they pay for labor and avoid losses. But the farmer can not avail himself of such expedients. He and his immediate family perform most of the work of the farm, and in the final analysis it simply means that there will be a reduction in the daily earnings of the farmer and his family. I devoutly pray this day may never come.

Then the great manufacturing concerns of our country may combine with the trusts in other countries or in some way reach an understanding that will avoid ruinous competition. But as the farmers at home can not combine with each other, likewise it would be utterly impossible for the farmers of one country to combine with those of another country. Without the protective tariff there would be free competition between our farmers and the farmers of the world.

IMPORTATION OF BROOM CORN.

The importation of farm products, when prices here range higher than in other countries, is absolutely certain. This is not a matter of conjecture. I have recently investigated a matter in which many of the farmers of my district are interested. Oklahoma, according to the census of 1910, produced, in the year 1909, 42,900,623 pounds of broom corn, valued at $2,560,426. A large part of this is produced in my congressional district.

In recent years it has been found that broom corn was being imported into this country. For the first time, I understand, in our history, the Payne-Aldrich Tariff Act placed a duty of $3 per ton on broom corn. It was thought this would be sufficient to afford our farmers reasonable protection from foreign imports of broom corn. But such has not been the case. A short time ago the Department of Commerce and Labor furnished me an official statement of the importations of broom corn for the calendar year of 1910. I was surprised to find that 15 foreign countries in 1910 had imported broom corn into the United States. The following countries are included in the list: Austria-Hungary, Belgium, France, Germany, Italy, Netherlands, Russia in Europe, Turkey in Europe, England, Canada, Argentina, Colombia, Japan, Turkey in Asia, Australia, and Tasmania.

For the year 1910, 7,330 tons of broom corn were imported into the United States, and the value of the imports amounted to $908,794. This shows how the new policy of free farm products will affect the farmers. The farmers of my district are compelled to compete with the cheap labor of Europe and Asia.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed until I get through.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman 10 minutes additional time.

Mr. MORGAN. They must compete with the cheap labor of Russia, Turkey, Italy, South America, Australia, and of Japan. I have seen it stated in western papers—and I have no doubt it is true—that the freight on a ton of broom corn from Constantinople to New York is only $15, while the freight on a ton of broom corn from northwestern Oklahoma or southwestern Kansas to New York is $24.80 per ton. So cheap water transportation will enable the farmers of every country in the world to flood the markets of our great cities with their products, which have been sowed, planted, cultivated, and garnered by the most ignorant and cheapest farm labor in existence. This is absolutely unfair to the farmers of the United States. For the protection of the farmers of the United States who raise broom corn, I have introduced a bill to place on broom corn a duty of $45 per ton. What fate this bill will have in the hands of a Democratic Ways and Means Committee I am unable to predict. But, so far as I am concerned, I protest against the proposed plan of placing our farmers in free competition with the cheapest and most ignorant labor of the world.

ABSENCE OF COMPETITION.

In the discussion of the tariff question the advocates of a protective tariff have always maintained that the price of the article upon which the tariff was levied would not be increased, because, with our home market secure, competition between home manufacturers would reduce the price; and especially would this be true when our own manufacturing establishments had time to develop and attain a high degree of perfection. There is no question about the correctness of this principle, and, in the main, the history of our industrial development demonstrates that this has been done. It has been true, as a rule, that when sufficient protection has been placed upon an article which we were capable of producing successfully, our own home manufacturers were soon selling us the article cheaper than the foreign manufacturer prior thereto had been selling us the articles. There is one fact that we, as protectionists, must now admit, and that is that in recent years there has been a complete revolution in our industrial system. Combinations have been formed, centralization has been going on, until it is an undeniable fact that in many important lines competition has been destroyed. A single corporation is able to control the supply and dictate the prices at which articles of common use are sold to the masses of the people. This is the weak point to-day in the armor of protection. In articles of general use necessary for the enjoyment and comfort of the masses of our people no corporation, combination, or association should have in its power to control the supply of the article and the prices at which it is sold. The most effective charge that has been made against a protective tariff has been that it is a shield for monopoly. The success attained by our political opponents in the campaign of 1910, which resulted in electing a Democratic House of Representatives, was due to the fact that the people were made to believe that the tariff law of 1909 was, in a measure at least, dictated by the so-called "special interests"—which the people understand to be the great corporations which have a monopoly in many lines of manufactured goods.

The people are willing to stand for protection to American industries when there is reasonable and fair competition at home. But the people will not favor protection to an industry that has become a monopoly, unless there is some method adopted that will place such regulations and control over the monopoly or will prevent it from imposing upon the people by exacting too great profits. Competition is the only safeguard the people have under a protective-tariff system as against imposition by the protected interests. When competition is destroyed the friends of protection must substitute some other device or system that will afford the people protection against monopoly.

Those who have stood for free trade and for a tariff for revenue only have maintained that the only remedy is to remove the tariff from all articles manufactured by a so-called trust or monopoly.

There are three objections to this method:

1. It will destroy the smaller, weaker, and independent concern first, and the trust may be able to live without the tariff.

2. This method would prevent new manufactories from going into business.

3. This method at best would in most cases simply give competition between a home trust and a foreign trust, because small and independent concerns abroad could not compete successfully with a gigantic corporation at home.

Some amicable arrangement would probably soon be made between the home and foreign trust and the people would soon be left without competition, with the supply of the article and the prices at which it is sold subject to the command of the monopoly.

The Republican Party does not stand as the defender of any corporation or combination that has been organized in violation of law. Under the administration of President Roosevelt unlawful corporations were prosecuted with great vigor and success. Under the direction of our present Chief Executive the Department of Justice has been exercising great diligence in initiating and prosecuting to trial suits against alleged unlawful corporations, combinations, and conspiracies.

But whatever may be the result of these suits, whatever construction the Supreme Court may give to the laws now in force, great corporations will continue to do a large part of the business of this country. There will still be an absence of competition in a large part of our industrial world.

The Republican Party believes in competition. It is opposed to monopoly. The Republican Party is the friend of the lawful business interests of this country, whether that business involves millions or hundreds of dollars. We do not believe in destroying business. We do not believe in the closing of factories. The Republican Party does not stand for a policy that means less business, lower prices, and smaller wages. We have always stood for the expansion of business, for growth in our industries, for good prices, and higher wages. Our opponents stand to-day for a policy that means destruction of business. The Republican Party has taken a stand not for the destruction of but the control of all lawful corporations doing an honest and legitimate business. Our policy is regulation, supervision, control. On this platform the Republican Party will in the end win the country.

But the time has come for the Republican Party to take a great step forward—not merely a platform declaration, but in the promulgation of some plan, some method, some practicable, tangible proposition that will take the place of competition in our great industrial system—preserve our great industrial corporations for the benefit and blessing of our people, and still subject them to such control as will guarantee the people against their unjust and unfair exactions. [Loud applause.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR].

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, on the 18th of February last there was printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the protest of the American National Live Stock Association against this pending bill, as well as the Canadian reciprocity bill. Inasmuch as that association is one of the largest and most important in the United States, very largely representing the live-stock interests of this country, and inasmuch as its headquarters is in the State I have the honor in part to represent, and also for the reason that some farmers' organizations have protested against the passage of the Canadian reciprocity bill, I will take the liberty, under the privilege of individual leave to print accorded me in connection with this measure, of inserting, in lieu of general remarks thereon to be delivered as of the above date, a letter which I have written to the secretary of the American National Live Stock Association, under date of May 29, 1911, in reply to a personal communication from him requesting my views upon these subjects.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., May 29, 1911.

Hon. T. W. TOMLINSON, Secretary,
The American National Live Stock Association,
Denver, Colo.

MY DEAR SIR: Your letter in relation to the proposed Canadian reciprocity agreement and the farmers' free-list bill, which passed the House some days ago and are now pending in the Senate, was duly received.

You object to the passage of both of these bills and ask for my reasons for voting for them and assure me that my answer will be published. I am pleased to avail myself of the opportunity of writing to the stockmen and ranchmen of Colorado upon these subjects, and you are at liberty to publish this letter, and I trust you will do so.

At the outset I may say that the high protectionists now in control of the United States Senate will never let the free-list bill pass, at least in its present form, and will probably not even consider it at this extra session of Congress. With the influence of President Taft, nearly all of the Democrats, and nearly one-half of the Republicans, the Senate may possibly succeed in passing the Canadian reciprocity agreement, in spite of the standpatters.

But inasmuch as I, along with every other Democrat in the House, without a single dissenting voice, voted for the farmers' free-list bill, and every prominent Democrat in the United States, so far as I can learn, and practically all of the progressive Republicans who desire tariff reform, are in favor of this bill; and inasmuch as I, along with all of the other 227 Democrats, except 10, and nearly one-half of all the Republicans of the House, voted for the Canadian reciprocity bill, I will gladly give you my views upon these measures, no matter whether either of them ever becomes a law or not. You of course understand that it is utterly out of the question to satisfactorily discuss by correspondence two tariff bills containing something like 600 different items. It would take probably a hundred volumes to give all the statistics and data necessary to fully present these questions in all their phases.

These measures are not local, but are international. There are, to my mind, many hundreds of beneficial features which would result from the passage of these bills. I will not, however, discuss those benefits, except possibly a few of them incidentally, but will endeavor primarily to answer the objections to these measures. It seems to me that some people who are, consciously or unconsciously, upholding the stand-pat, high-protection doctrine are shutting their eyes to hundreds of benefits to the country and the public at large and are looking at some one feature only, and seeing that wrongly.

While there is a great deal of honest apprehension about these measures I surmise that there are some gentlemen over the country who may be trying to make some political capital out of them. I have no personal reference to you, but I wish every fair-minded man would himself read these two bills and consider a few of the facts upon which they are based before he assumes to criticize them. These two bills are entirely separate and distinct and have nothing to do with each other. The Canadian reciprocity agreement, or treaty, is a Republican measure and the free-list bill is a Democratic measure. Both bills are compromises, as nearly all matters of legislation are. Both expand our markets, reduce the tariff on the necessities of life, promote trade, and are intended to reduce the high cost of living without injuring the farmer or stockman or anyone else. Both bills are actuated by equal good faith and patriotic desire to benefit the entire country. The Republican reciprocity bill is local and applies only to Canada, while the Democratic free-list bill is general, and upon the specific articles that it covers it applies to the whole world. In the reciprocity agreement the President has made the best bargain with Canada he could, and in the free-list bill the Democrats, representing all interests and sections of the entire country, have prepared, presented, and passed the best compromise bill they could. In order to hold together, the Democrats, who are in control of the House, are compelled to make concessions to the various portions of the United States. The big financial protected interests of the country are now turning heaven and earth to create dissension in our ranks, and if we are ever going to accomplish anything for the relief of the American people against the combined, insidious, and constant assault of the trusts, monopolies, and combines of this country, we absolutely must stand solidly together. So that I have no apology to make for voting with the party that has twice honored me by a seat in Congress. If I have done wrong in voting for these two bills I have the consolation of being in a most remarkable array of distinguished company.

The farmers' free-list bill, in my judgment, reaches further toward the general welfare of all the people of this country than any piece of legislation that has passed Congress in the past 20 years, and if it is not enacted into law I want the public to place the responsibility where it belongs. It is only one step, but it is a very long step, in the direction of relieving the American people—especially the farmers, but also all classes of people in every walk of life—from the oppressive monopolies of this country. It removes the duty on every sort of an agricultural implement that can be devised for working land or for carrying on the various industries connected with crop raising, stock growing, fruit growing, and farming in general, from a thrashing machine to a hoe and from a farm wagon to a cotton gin. These implements are enumerated either specifically or are carried in a general clause which includes them all. The bill also removes the duty on salt, barb-wire fencing, boots, shoes, harness, saddles, and all kinds of leather and materials made from leather; baling wire, hoop and band iron, gunny cloth, and hundreds of other articles. Can anyone say these duty removals are not also beneficial to the stockmen?

The farmers' free-list bill does not remove the duty on any of the farmer's grain, stock, potatoes, or produce, but removes the duty on all those articles of daily use, including flour, meat, and nearly everything the farmer buys. In fact, it sets forth what the Democratic Party believes, viz, that the time has arrived for Congress to commence keeping faith with the American people in general and the farmer in particular in regard to reducing the tariff and putting their necessities and daily living on a more reasonable basis.

These measures are not one-sided, but six-hundred-sided. There are, directly or indirectly, affected in the reciprocity bill about 500 commodities and in the free-list bill about 100 commodities, all of which have to do with the daily life of the American citizen, be he farmer, merchant, stockman, laborer, or professional man.

According to the proposed agreement with Canada the tariff is to be either removed entirely or very greatly reduced on a range of commodities the extent of which can hardly be realized by persons who have not read the bill. The list, which time and space make it unreasonable to mention here, runs the gamut of all the necessities of the people of this country, and includes all agricultural implements, lumber, small grains, cutlery, automobiles, meats, fish, live animals, salt, vegetables, wood pulp, fruits of all kinds, laths, shingles, coal, wheat, poultry, buckwheat, telephone poles, wire, type-setting machines, barb-wire fencing, printing ink, plate glass, trees, peanuts, cement, confectionery, and so on, throughout the collection of commodities which the experts of both Nations, who worked for months on this project, deemed advisable to insert in the reciprocal agreement. I believe that if the stock growers and farmers, as well as those connected with every other industry represented in Colorado, will carefully consider the wide scope of the tariff revision now being undertaken by the Democratic Party, and will bear in mind the universal demand of not only the large majority of the people of Colorado but every other State for an honest readjustment and reduction of the tariff, for the widening of our markets, and a curtailing of the existing monopolies and enormous profits of the trusts, they will be less apprehensive of any danger to the farm or stock business, or any other great interest that affects the welfare of Colorado. Those interests are not being singled out, and we do not believe that they are at all endangered by the pending bills.

In the first place, reciprocity has been advocated by the Democratic Party for over 50 years, and many leaders of the Republican Party have in recent years been advocating it. The Democratic Party has several times specifically, in its national platforms, urged reciprocity with Canada and reciprocal trade relations with other countries. In the last speech he made at Buffalo, just before he was assassinated, President McKinley earnestly urged reciprocal trade relations with Canada. He said:

A system which provides a mutual exchange of commodities is manifestly essential to the continued and healthful growth of our export trade. We must not repose in fancied security that we can forever sell everything and buy little or nothing. If such a thing was possible, it would not be best for us or for those with whom we deal. We should take from our customers such of their products as we can use without harm to our industries and labor. Reciprocity is the natural outgrowth of our wonderful industrial development. What we produce beyond our domestic consumption must have a vent abroad. The excess must be relieved through a foreign outlet, and we should sell everywhere we can and buy wherever the buying will enlarge our sales and productions, and thereby make a greater demand for home labor. Commercial wars are unprofitable. A policy of good will and friendly trade relations will prevent reprisals. Reciprocity treaties are in harmony with the spirit of the times; measures of retaliation are not. If perchance some of our tariffs are no longer needed for revenue or to encourage and protect our industries at home, why should they not be employed to extend and promote our market abroad?

In your printed circular of February 13, to which you refer and which I noticed and carefully considered at the time it was introduced in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD by Senator WARREN, your association vigorously denounced the Payne-Aldrich tariff law and earnestly urged upon Congress and the President of the United States the passage of a Canadian reciprocity treaty. You say:

This association has stood for many years for fair and equitable reciprocal trade agreements with other countries, whereby all the interests of this Nation—the producer, consumer, the manufacturer, and the middleman—will surrender some favors or benefits of the tariff system in exchange for mutual advantages to be secured from other nations. That is our position to-day.

Further on you eloquently say:

Commercially, racially, and in the character of resources Canada and the United States are alike, and there should be no prohibitive tariff wall between them. This association heartily approves of a fair, equitable trade arrangement with Canada, and the live-stock industry is willing to stand its share of any concessions toward that end. * * * We have waited long for a fair trade agreement with Canada, and we can well afford to wait a little longer until the question is settled right.

But you protest against this agreement because it does not "include every commodity likely to be exchanged between these two nations, so closely related." In other words, you object because the agreement is not broad enough, and this official protest of your association closes by "vigorously" urging the Government, the Tariff Board, and Congress "to negotiate as speedily as possible a treaty with Canada," and so forth. The simple and conclusive answer to your protest is that it takes two to make a bargain, and President Taft and the American commissioners have made that trade agreement just as broad as the negotiations with Canada would permit.

President Taft tried very hard indeed to secure an absolutely free-trade agreement with Canada in everything; but Canada positively would not agree to it because she has a protective system of her own, and she was very naturally afraid of the competition of our much larger and better organized industries. Besides Canada can not at this time enter into a free-trade arrangement with us because of her relations with England, her mother country.

The President and all the public officials and broad-minded statesmen of this Nation fully realize that we must expand our trade relations. Everybody is in favor of reciprocal trade agreements excepting the unjustly protected monopolies. We can not live within ourselves alone and long continue to be the happy and prosperous people we should be. It is universally recognized that Canada is composed of the same kind of people as ourselves, with the same language, having the same high ideals of citizenship and civilization, with territory immediately adjoining us for 3,000 miles on the north, and always has been a good neighbor to us. We should not therefore permit a tariff wall between the two countries to longer put an unnecessary barrier and hindrance upon our trade relations with her.

You will recall that a Democratic Congress enacted a reciprocity agreement with Canada in 1854, and that said agreement lasted until 1866, when it was repealed by a Republican Congress. The same interests that brought about its repeal in an insidious way are now bitterly opposing this bill. During the 4 years immediately preceding the negotiation of that treaty our exports to Canada were a little over $43,000,000; and for the 4 years immediately after the treaty they were $104,000,000. The total trade between Canada and the United States for the 4 years immediately before the treaty amounted to only $66,000,000, while for the 4 years immediately following the treaty it amounted to $178,000,000; and our exports to Canada during the 12 years of that treaty were nearly three times as much as they were during the 12 years immediately before entering into it, notwithstanding the Civil War during that time largely paralyzed our export trade.

President Taft took this matter up in a public-spirited and statesmanlike way, and I feel he is at least entitled to the respectful consideration of the American people for doing the best he could. There are several things in the treaty that I hoped would be different. But they are so far outweighed by the hundreds of beneficial features that I am confident, on the whole, it is an exceedingly good trade for us. At any rate it is the best we can get, therefore what is the use of some people denouncing the President and Secretary of Agriculture and nearly all the Congressmen when they are doing the best they can? I think the only fair and sensible course is to try it once. The people of Canada have not yet agreed to it. They have been for three months vigorously denouncing it as a jug-handle deal against them. They insist that the American commissioners got the best of the bargain. The President has had the best experts there are in the world at his disposal. Our commissioners have worked with the Canadian commissioners for months, and they have made the best agreement they possibly could. Any agreement is not a one-sided proposition; if it was it would not be an agreement but a surrender by one party to the other. No one can in this world expect to get everything and give up nothing. This reciprocity is a give-and-take proposition, covering all those hundreds of different items, and no one under heaven can say positively whether it will work beneficially or not until we try it. President Taft, with all his experts, and Secretary Wilson both emphatically insist—and no one can question their honesty in the matter—that neither the farmers nor stockmen of this country will be hurt a particle, but will be vastly benefited by this agreement. They and their advisers are willing to stake their official reputations and the welfare of the Republican Party and the opinion of history upon the correctness of their judgment and good faith in this matter. A Republican President, actuated by patriotic motives, negotiated and presented to Congress this reciprocity agreement as a Republican administration measure for the welfare of the American people. Now, when practically everybody in the United States who is not engaged in holding up the public is in favor of a reciprocity agreement with Canada and in favor of the reduction of unnecessary high tariffs that hinder trade between the United States and our nearest and most friendly neighbor, and when this agreement insures a much more liberal commercial intercourse and freer trade relations with Canada, what kind of petty partisan politics would it have been if we Democrats as a party had refused to assist the President of the United States in the trial of this measure when it is along the very lines we have long been advocating?

It has been repeatedly pointed out to us that if this Canadian reciprocity proves a great success President Taft and the Republican Party will promptly claim all the credit for it, and if it turns out a failure the Democratic Party will be as promptly blamed for the whole thing. Be that as it may, it is an honest effort and the best we can get in the direction of what the people want. I do not and you do not know whether it is going to be satisfactory. The Republican President and Secretary of Agriculture have more knowledge upon this subject than any other two citizens of this country. They have put in months upon it, with all their expert assistants; they have sent agents to Canada and other countries, and we have their reports. The members of the Democratic Ways and Means Committee of the House and many prominent and patriotic Republicans have put in many months on these very tariff questions, and they are perfectly confident that this bill is going to be one of the most far-reaching and beneficial measures that has ever been enacted by an American Congress. When it is directly in accordance with Democratic doctrine and along the line of what the public wants, why should we not take them at their word and give this measure a fair trial? Do you candidly think your knowledge is superior to all of them and the majority of Congress? If the treaty is not a success, it can be repealed. We do not need to let it stand for 30 days or 30 minutes if it does not prove satisfactory.

Both the opponents and those who favor the measure have produced volumes of figures. These do not prove anything definitely as to what will be the actual working result of this treaty, should it go into effect. But there are in this connection some important facts and some definite figures which seem to me ought to always be borne in mind. Canada's population is 7,500,000; ours is 92,000,000. Canada has always been a good customer of ours. She buys from us every year $30 per capita of her entire population, while we buy from her only $1 per capita of our population. Canada has a tariff which operates very strongly against our products being sold in Canada. We have a tariff which operates against Canadian products being sold here. This reciprocity treaty is merely a trade agreement between the two countries to mutually wipe out some and reduce other tariffs, with a view to a more extended and freer trade between us. I am not one of those who seem to believe that nations can not trade with each other without one or the other being cheated. I believe that both nations, cities, merchants, and farmers can deal with each other and both be benefited by it. Any country which buys a great deal more from us than we buy from it is certainly a good country for us to trade with, and no retaliatory tariff wall should stand between us and such a country. A tariff wall between this country and Canada looks to me just like a spite wall between two neighbors, or like two farmers each keeping up a parallel-line fence with a "devil's lane" between. Parallel fences are a great waste of material and energy and a destroyer of business and good will. From a business standpoint there is no more sense in maintaining a tariff wall between this country and Canada than there would be in creating one between the east and west banks of the Mississippi River. Suppose we had a high-tariff wall around Colorado. We would be practically put out of business in 30 days. The same rule largely applies to our country.

During the five years ending June 30 last, in spite of the double tariff walls between the two countries—

We sold in Canada	$886,417,376
Canada sold to us	393,913,673
Difference in our favor	492,503,703
Horses:
We sold in Canada	14,172,075
Canada sold to us	2,549,201
Difference in our favor	11,622,847
Cattle:
We sold in Canada	1,578,179
Canada sold to us	1,193,796
Difference in our favor	384,383
Meat and dairy products:
We sold in Canada	17,011,017
Canada sold to us	904,191
Difference in our favor	16,106,826
Breadstuffs:
We sold in Canada	31,596,556
Canada sold to us	6,679,884
Difference in our favor	24,916,672

The aggregate imports into Canada from all countries during the last fiscal year were, in round numbers, $376,000,000, of which there came from the United States, in round numbers, $223,000,000. Canada therefore bought of us, even under existing high-tariff conditions, nearly two-thirds of all her foreign purchases.

The official statistics conclusively show that the average value of horses in the United States is $108.19; in Canada, $133. Dairy cows in United States, $35.79; in Canada, $43. Other cattle, without respect to age or grade, in the United States, $19.41; in Canada, $31. Sheep in the United States, $4.08; in Canada, $6. Hogs in the United States, $9.14; in Canada, $11. Why would the Canadian farmer ship these animals to the United States and sell them for less than they are worth at home?

I believe it is the consensus of opinion of practically all of those who have studied the matter in an impartial way that in nearly everything, with the possible exception of wheat and barley, our exports of agricultural products into Canada will grow much more rapidly than the imports into the United States from Canada if this treaty is enacted.

There is, as everyone knows, a vast difference between the United States and Canada in climate. The growing season in that country is much shorter than ours. Their spring opens from one to three months later, and frost comes a month earlier in the fall. Our farmers and horticulturists grow hundreds of products in which Canada never can compete, and which we can sell them in large quantities, especially if we buy lumber, wood pulp, and other things from them in return. For instance, the Canadian market will largely benefit the market for our cantaloupes, watermelons, and fruits of all kinds. The Canadians are great fruit eaters, and they buy immense quantities of those products from us, and want more. They would buy many times more than they do now if it were not for the tariff obstacles between the two countries. Let me remind my Rocky Ford and Grand Valley friends that the State of Georgia is expecting, under this agreement, to ship millions of dollars' worth of watermelons to Canada. Colorado is closer to Canada than Georgia. The whole world is demanding more fruit. The fruit business of this country has grown enormously. Ten years ago we exported only $8,000,000 worth of fruit. Last year we exported $23,000,000 worth. An increase of about 180 per cent in 10 years. We must constantly enlarge our markets for fruit. The average western Canadian farmer is a "one-crop" farmer. Diversified farming has not and will not make much progress in western Canada for a great many years to come. Horses, fruits, vegetables, hay, dairy, and poultry products will for many years to come be very largely exported from this country into Canada. The reciprocity agreement puts all of those articles on the free list. The effect of that will be to greatly increase the demand for them in this country, make the market more stable, and Colorado will be one of the States most benefited.

CATTLE.

We have in this country 71,000,000 head of cattle and 92,000,000 people, or seven cattle to every nine persons. Canada has 7,000,000 head of cattle to 7,500,000 people, or less than one head of cattle to each person. Mexico has 13,000,000 people and only 5,000,000 cattle, or 7 to every 17 persons. We have 10 times as many cattle as Canada has and 14 times as many as Mexico. The Canadian cattle are as good a grade as ours and are higher in price; they have to feed longer and more than we do; but the Mexican cattle are far inferior to ours. Our imports of cattle from Mexico have been increasing very rapidly during recent years. In fact, Mexico is a very necessary and important source of supply for us. Five years ago we only imported about 23,000 head, while last year we imported 188,000 head. In fact, we buy practically all the cattle from Mexico that they can spare, and our cattle growers are very glad to get them. But the cattle that we purchase from Mexico are mostly young or range or feeders, and the average price we pay for them is $13.90; while, on the other hand, we export to Mexico, for breeding and stocking purpose, from 5,000 to 30,000 head of cattle a year, and we get an average of $30.70 a head for them. In other words, we get more than twice as much for the cattle we sell Mexico as we pay Mexico for her cattle. In fact, it is of the utmost importance for us to cultivate friendly relations with Mexico and encourage our dealing with her in the cattle business. Especially is this true when our cattlemen are now scouring the whole country for places to buy cattle and are paying as high as $20 and $25 a head for yearlings. Mexico can not compete with us in beef cattle at all, and they have no packing establishments that can compete with ours. Our packers could can nearly every hoof in Mexico in 48 hours. So I see nothing to fear from competition with Mexico, and I feel that we have everything to gain by cultivating friendly relations with our sister Republic on the south, not only in the cattle business, but in every other business that does not bring American labor in competition with the cheaper labor of that country. It will be readily seen that there is no possibility of any flood of cattle or beef from either Canada or Mexico that will interfere with our markets at all, because neither country has any more than it needs, and Canada buys more from us than they sell us. Both countries are very valuable neighbors to us in the cattle business; and I am confident that if the tariff were entirely removed from cattle and beef products between this country and both Canada and Mexico that the balance of trade would be very much larger in our favor.

Concerning Argentina, Australia, and the rest of the world, I think the fears as to the future are not well founded. If they are, we can readily regulate any adverse trade relations when that time comes. During the past four years we exported $124,000,000 worth of cattle and imported only $4,000,000 worth of cattle, and most of those came from Mexico, as above stated. That is, we exported more than 30 times as much in value as we imported, and we sold them at a good price in competition with all the world, including Australia and Argentina, which seems to be such a bugagoo to some people. Besides the exportations of cattle during that period, we also exported $125,000,000 worth of beef products, and sold that in competition with Argentina and all the rest of the world. So that I can not see where our cattlemen and meat producers can be hurt by putting both of those articles on the free list. During the one year 1909, for which statistical figures are complete, we exported about $156,000,000 worth of meat products of all kinds in competition with the world and we imported less than $1,000,000. When we export 160 times more than we import, I can not understand how Congress or our high-protection Republican friends can make the American people believe that the Beef Trusts need a 22 per cent protection any longer. Moreover, the statement is made without contradiction, and there is apparently no question about the truth of it, that the big packing houses of this country either own or control all of the packing concerns of Argentina, and they ship the beef products from that country to Europe, where they are sold in the same markets in which they sell their products from this country. It does not look reasonable to me that the packers would ship their products from Argentina to the United States, 10,000 miles, when they already have an annual surplus here of about $156,000,000, which they ship all over the world. It would be no more unreasonable to suppose that these packers, when meat is put on the free list, will ship the products of United States to Argentina. That would be like carrying coals to Newcastle. In other words, if the tariff does not affect the price, I can see no injury that would happen to either the cattle growers or meat packers. The only effect of reducing the tariff would be in times of scarcity in this country the consumer would not be held up by the middle men and charged exorbitant prices. The big packing houses of this country that are now being prosecuted by the Government as criminal conspirators are not going to quit business even if they should be compelled to obey the law. They are going right ahead packing and handling American cattle, and they will not pay the stockmen any more than they are compelled to to keep them raising cattle. Considering the sources of cattle supply and feed for them and the cattle business generally and the rate the population of this country and the world is increasing, there is no question in my mind but what prices of cattle, sheep, and hogs are going to increase and continue to increase.

HORSES.

During the past four years we exported $14,000,000 worth of horses mostly to Canada and imported from the whole world only $7,000,000 worth, mostly for breeding. Canada is a splendid market for our horse growers, and that market will be very much stimulated by the passage of the reciprocity agreement.

HOGS.

During the four years mentioned we exported of hogs and hog products the enormous sum of $450,000,000, and imported practically none. I give the figures in round numbers, but they are all taken from the 1910 Yearbook of the Agricultural Department and other official reports and are correct unless in my rather hasty computation I have made some slight clerical errors. Anyone can easily check them up.

CORN.

The present duty on corn is 15 cents a bushel. This agreement puts it on the free list. There is no more sense of having a duty on corn coming into the United States from Canada than from Greenland. The farmers and stockmen of this country get no benefit from the tariff on any produce when our exports vastly exceed the imports of the article. We grow 80 per cent of all the corn of the world. During the last four years for which statistics are available, we exported over $165,000,000 worth of corn, while we imported of all kinds—mostly for seed purpose—only $216,000 worth. In other words, we exported 700 times as much as we imported. During that time we exported to Canada $20,000,000 worth of corn and imported practically none. Canada can not grow corn to any successful degree. And yet some politicians and tariff fakers are trying to make the farmers believe that President Taft and the Democratic Party are "in cahoots" to destroy the corn industry of this country by removing the tariff and allowing Canadian corn to flood and swamp our markets and reduce the price. There is nearly as much corn raised every year on the farm in Illinois on which I was born as is produced by the entire Dominion of Canada, with all her Provinces. But that bugaboo is no more of a farce and swindle upon the American farmer than a great many other tariff claims that are industriously made by the high protectionists.

WHEAT.

During the past four years for which statistics are available we imported from all the world only $656,000 worth of wheat, while during that time we exported $256,000,000 worth of wheat and over $236,000,000 worth of flour made of American wheat. In other words, we exported and sold in competition with Canada, South America, India, Russia, Argentina, and all the balance of the world 400 times as much wheat and over 225 times as much flour as we imported from all the world. And most of those importations were merely for seed purposes. A great hue and cry is made about wheat, whereas everyone knows, or ought to know, that the value of wheat is regulated by the world supply and demand, and the price is always and every place on earth determined by the price on the London and Liverpool markets. Therefore it makes no difference whether we have free trade or protection between Canada and the United States. Both countries have to sell at the London and Liverpool prices, tariff wall or no tariff wall. All of the opponents of this Canadian agreement center their fire upon the one subject of wheat and insist that our wheat growers will be ruined by competition with Canada. What the future may bring forth no one can tell. I have confidence in the wisdom of the American people and future Congresses to take care of our interests in the future as they may be affected from time to time, and the same may be said in our relations with all of the other countries. But for the present I can see nothing that the American farmer needs to fear from Canadian wheat. The present duty on wheat is 25 cents a bushel. Anyone can see by looking at almost any daily paper in the United States that the price of wheat is now and has practically been for years the same in Chicago that it is in Winnipeg, the great wheat market of Canada. When there is any difference Winnipeg is from a half cent to 2 cents higher than Chicago. On the other hand, wheat in Minneapolis averages from 4 to 5 cents a bushel higher all the time than it is in Chicago or Winnipeg, and whenever the market changes in Liverpool a fraction of a cent the same corresponding change is reflected in Minneapolis and Winnipeg. If this Canadian tariff is removed, the American people will not be injured, but will be benefited by the removal of that duty, because it will prevent Liverpool from being able, as it now does, to play Canada against the United States, and vice versa, and it will tend to prevent the fluctuation of prices.

BARLEY.

In the last four years referred to we exported over $21,000,000 worth of barley, and imported, in round numbers, only $250,000 worth. In other words, we exported nearly 100 times as much as we imported, and we sold it at a good price in competition with all the world. During the last year we imported less than $1,500 worth of barley and exported more than $4,500,000 worth of that product.

RYE.

Of rye we exported $4,700,781 worth and imported only $197. In other words, we exported more than 20,000 times as much as we imported. In the name of common sense, what good can the farmer get by a duty on rye?

OATS.

We exported oats to the value of nearly $20,000,000 and imported only a little over $2,000,000 worth. In other words, our exports were nearly eight times as much as our imports.

POTATOES.

Some individuals seem to be industriously giving out misinformation upon this subject, and trying to make political capital out of pure buncombe by frightening the potato growers about a flood of cheap potatoes. I notice a lengthy statement going the rounds of the press in which it was said:

> If the free-list bill passes, it would mean the opening of our markets to Argentina, Australia, Belgium, France, Ireland, Scotland, and the whole world, and the western potato grower would never again be able to ship his potatoes east of the Mississippi River.

Such statements seem almost incredible, especially when they are made by men who know better. In the whole article I noticed there is not one whole truth. Even the present duty on potatoes is given as 40 cents a bushel, when it is only 25. The simple answer to all that effort at public deception is that potatoes are not mentioned or included in the free-list bill in any way whatever. There are no vegetables or grains in that bill. It puts meats and flour on the free list, but no direct farm produce. It is merely one of the many bold efforts to try to prejudice the farmers of the West by telling them that our markets are going to be opened to those foreign countries mentioned above. When you scratch under the surface on those fellows, nine times out of ten you will find either some one who has not studied the subject or even read the bills, and is misinformed, or he is some designing politician or a high protectionist, who would object to free trade between this country and Iceland or a representative of some of the big protected interests that are opposed to any tariff revision. The animus of that article is plainly shown when it is "confidently predicted" that the Democratic Party will be ignominously defeated at the next election by reason of the free-list bill. If the potato growers of the United States are in any way injured by either of these bills, it will be by the Republican reciprocity bill and not by the Democratic free-list bill. The Canadian reciprocity bill puts potatoes on the free list, and that will open the markets of the United States to Canadian potatoes, as well as open the Canadian markets to our potatoes. But anyone who candidly studies the potato situation and trade relations between the United States and Canada can not, it seems to me, justly have any fear of a flood of potatoes coming from Canada. The present import duty into the United States is 25 cents a bushel and the present import duty into Canada is 20 cents a bushel. During the last year the United States exported into Canada and paid the 20 cents a bushel duty on 200,000 bushels of potatoes, that being the largest export that this country has ever made to Canada in any one year. Farm labor is just as high is Canada as it is here, and we have a much better potato country than Canada. We grow better potatoes and nearly four times as many as Canada. During the past five years we imported more from Canada than we exported, we importing 1,880,000 bushels and exporting only 800,000 bushels; but over one-half of all that importation came in during one year, owing to a shortage of crop in some portions of this country and other temporary conditions. Our production of potatoes is increasing at the rate of about 8 per cent a year, and there is no prospect of America being able to get potatoes any cheaper from Canada than our farmers can raise them at a profit here. In fact, the entire surplus of potatoes in the Dominion of Canada would not feed one city in this country. So that political bugaboo is ridiculous.

The situation of the farmers and stockmen of the United States is this: If they could lawfully combine and organize a trust, the same as the Meat Trust, Steel Trust, Lumber Trust, Paper Trust, and other trusts, and thereby have the power to control the output and to say when, where, and how much should be put on the market, and fix the price, they could take advantage of the tariff and charge for their products in the home market the world-market price, plus the tariff. But being so many in number, and so diffused and scattered throughout the country, it is utterly impossible for them to so combine or organize. So that, generally speaking, their products derive no benefit whatever from the tariff. Their prices are controlled by the open markets of the world, while, on the other hand, the meat packers, the steel, lumber, paper, and many other manufacturing plants are so few in number comparatively and are so vast in influence, that they can and do organize into trusts and unlawful combines and monopolies, and control the output and fix the prices and hold up the American consumer to the world prices, plus our own tariff, no matter whether it is high or low; and then sell their surplus products to the foreigner at the cheaper world-market prices. With a very few possible exceptions, the tariff as it affects the farm produce, especially the farmers and stockmen of the West, is a delusion and a deception, and this brazen fraud has been practiced upon them by the high protectionists for more than a third of a century.

Sugar and wool are not involved in the pending bills. Therefore, I shall not go into those matters now except to say that I think the sugar-beet and wool growers of Colorado should, and probably do, receive some little benefit from the tariff on their products. But, whether they do or not, the necessity of providing revenue for the running of the Government requires that Uncle Sam shall not for the present, or until our tariff rates are readjusted considerably and some other source of revenue derived, relinquish very much of the $80,000,000 in duties which sugar and wool annually produce. I am now doing my utmost to prevent the Democrats and Republicans together from treating the sheepmen in the same manner the Republicans treated the cattle growers two years ago when they passed the Payne-Aldrich bill and put hides on the free list. I voted against placing hides on the free list. I thought then, and I think now, that the Republicans did a wrong to the stockmen and to the people in removing the duty on hides and refusing to take it off of boots, shoes, harness, saddles, and other classes of leather goods. And, notwithstanding that President Taft says publicly that the present duty on wool in the Payne-Aldrich bill is so high as to be utterly indefensible, I want, if possible, to see the duties on the manufactured products of wool lowered to a necessary revenue basis before we take much duty off of raw wool. I want the Government to raise the $20,000,000 a year revenue that we now get from the woolen manufactured goods in some other way than by taxation upon the clothes of the people. I will cross that bridge, however, when I get to it. I am confident that those of us who desire to give the sheepmen a square deal with the woolen manufactures are going to be at least partially successful. I am confident that the Democratic majority of the House will make a conservative reduction in the duty on wool, and a larger reduction on woolen goods. In my judgment wool will not be put on the free list by this Congress. I hope to be able in this, the same as in both the Canadian reciprocity and free-list bills, to support the concerted judgment of the Democratic Party.

On February 9, 1910, the Senate appointed a select committee to investigate the prices of commodities, and the cause of any increase in the same. That committee was composed of five Republicans and three Democrats, they being among the most distinguished men of that body. After months of hard work and diligent investigation they reported. And while there was a majority and a minority report that widely differed on some things, they absolutely agreed, and so reported to the Senate—and I wish every farmer in the United States could read that document—that the tariff on wheat, corn, rye, barley, oats, cattle and live stock, and all agricultural products has nothing to do with the prices of these commodities. It further declared that the prices of those products of the farmer were fixed in the markets of the world, and produced elaborate figures to substantiate the fact that those products are ordinarily higher in London, Liverpool, and the world's markets generally than they are here in our own high-protection United States. The national campaign textbook of the Republican Party of last year at page 144 says:

> The present advance in prices is, as has been stated, primarily an advance in farm products and food and domestic production. * * * The tariff seems to have been no material factor in causing advance in prices during the past decade. * * * The advance in prices during the last 10 years appears to have no relation with tariff legislation.

At pages 146 and 147 of the book it is stated:

> That the tariff is not the cause of the present advance is conclusively shown by the fact that the greatest advance has been made on commodities which are usually produced in such quantities as to furnish a large surplus to other countries.

Of such products it mentions specifically "barley, corn, oats, rye, wheat, and live stock, consisting of cattle, hogs, sheep," and so forth. It further says:

> But the fact that exports of products of the farm continue in such large quantities indicates that the price movement is due not to the tariff, but to a world-wide movement upward in the price of those commodities. The course of prices indicates plainly that the world is demanding our food supplies, and that the prices have advanced here not by reason of the tariff, but with the general upward movement.

That is exactly what the Democrats have been claiming all these years, that the so-called farmer's product tariff was a fraud and a sham put on to fool the farmers into voting the Republican ticket. And now the high-protection stand-pat Republican leaders, in order to defend the Payne-Aldrich high-tariff bill before the consumers of the country, come up and plead guilty and confess before the American people that they have been humbugging the farmers and stockmen for 40 years. Has an intelligent country ever witnessed an exhibition of more supreme nerve?

In other words, the American farmer sells his products here in our home market, which is lower than practically all the other markets of the civilized world, and he pays more here at home for all his farm implements and most other things that he buys than are charged for the same articles by the American trusts when they sell to the farmers in all the other countries of the world. This benevolent Payne-Aldrich high-protection tariff is certainly a great scheme. The farmer gets buncoed going and coming, and the consumer gets held up all around.

As an illustration of the difference between what the farmer gets for his produce and what the consumer has to pay New York City furnishes a good example. The inhabitants of that city last year paid $60,000,000 for potatoes. The farmers who produced those potatoes had to sell them for $8,000,000. During the same time the inhabitants purchased $9,000,000 worth of cabbages, and the farmers who raised them got $2,000,000 for them. The city paid $8,000,000 for onions, for which the farmers who produced them realized less than $1,000,000. Will anybody say that there is any sense or justice in the enormous difference in the prices received by the producer and the cost to the consumer? The same thing applies all along the line, not only to the farmer but to the stockman. But the Democratic Party is earnestly attacking this stupendous condition. We may make some mistakes, but we will have to make almost incredible blunders to make conditions worse than they are now under the present Payne-Aldrich tariff law.

Every Congressman is elected from some particular State and district, and his thoughts are primarily and very naturally and justly for the welfare of the constituents who elected him. At the same time these tariff matters are national issues, and no one who has had no actual experience realizes the thousands of widely different and largely conflicting interests of this country. We can only legislate for the general welfare by trying to compromise and harmonize these various and nation-wide diversified interests among 92,000,000 people, whose sentiments are as divergent as their interests and almost as far apart as the North and South Poles. So that a Congressman is constantly compelled to yield something to the other 390 Members of the House, and if his constituents will not be reasonable enough and broad enough to permit him, after he has done the best he can for his constituents, to yield something to the general welfare of the whole country, we never can have any national or statesmanlike legislation. In other words, unless every State, every locality, and every interest is willing or can be compelled to concede something to the general welfare of this country, there is no more possibility of revising the tariff downward than there is of repealing the law of gravitation. If a Congressman can not be permitted by his constituents to legislate, at least partially, in the interest of this Nation as a whole, if his constituents are unwilling to yield anything, if he must be threatened with political extermination every time he has a patriotic thought beyond the confines of his own district, or casts a vote for the general welfare of this entire country that he has sworn to represent, we never can have any just tariff legislation, and the trusts and monopolies will continue to raise the price of everything we buy and pay us what they please for what we have to sell.

Canada does not favor this reciprocity with us for the purpose of opening our markets to her wheat or her live stock, because she already has the same markets of the world that we have in which to sell her surplus and the same means that we have to get her products to the markets of the world. She ships her surplus to Liverpool and London the same as we do, and Canada and the United States and every other nation get the same prices in the same markets for the same products, regardless of where they come from. But Canada wants our market for her lumber, shingles, laths, wood pulp and paper, and other timber products, and for her fish and chemicals and other articles of like nature. None of those articles are produced by the American farmer, and all of them are needed by every farmer. Canada wants the tariff wall lowered against these products which her people wish to sell us and she also wishes our tariff wall lowered against the products her people wish to buy from us.

Colorado is becoming a great fruit-producing State. Canada is not and never will become a competitive fruit-producing country. During the last year we sold Canada 59,000 barrels of apples, in spite of a tariff of 40 cents a barrel. We sold her nearly 5,000,000 pounds of peaches, against a tariff of $1 a hundred pounds. We sold her nearly $5,000,000 worth of pears, apricots, quinces, and so forth, against a tariff of 50 cents a hundred pounds. We sold her timothy and clover seeds to the amount of $750,000, against a tariff of 50 per cent ad valorem. Is there any sane person who believes that we would not have sold her a great many times that amount if that tariff had been taken off?

Some one the other day objected to removing the tariff on beans. As a matter of fact, the State of Michigan alone produces five times as many beans as the entire Dominion of Canada.

Our hay growers can not be hurt, because hay is on an average about a dollar a ton higher in Canada all the time than it is in the United States, and we produce seven times as much as Canada does.

Some poultry raisers object to a reduction of the tariff on eggs and predict that this country will be deluged with a shower of eggs from Canada. As a matter of fact, if the entire export of eggs from Canada to the world was sent to New York City alone, it would take two years to furnish the inhabitants of that city one egg apiece.

The recent Eighteenth General Assembly of the State of Colorado passed a vigorous joint memorial to Congress and to the Colorado Representatives demanding an immediate revision of tariffs by the reduction of import duties, and demanding that articles in competition with trust-controlled products be placed upon the free list, and that material reductions be made in the tariff upon the necessities of life, especially upon articles which the American manufacturers sell abroad more cheaply than they sell at home. It was generally demanded, in fact, that the tariff be reduced to a revenue basis and in such manner as to prevent, as far as possible, combinations in restraint of our trade. I am very diligently doing the best I possibly can toward carrying out those instructions, which I deem eminently wise and patriotic. I always earnestly try to learn the wishes and, in every vote I cast, endeavor to reflect the welfare of the 800,000 Coloradans whom I have the honor to represent. I believe these excessively high tariffs beyond the amount of revenue necessary to run the Government have become an outrageous swindle upon the American people But, at the same time, when we come to revise the tariff downward or make any changes, Congress is besieged by every industry in the United States. Everyone wants to revise the other fellow. No one is willing to give up anything or experiment in any way in a reduction upon his own products, and for that reason, if we are ever to accomplish anything, we are going to be compelled to overlook some fears, especially where we do not think they are well founded.

Your association very emphatically denounces the present Payne-Aldrich tariff law, and I think every disinterested, fair-minded person recognizes that it fetters legitimate business, curtails the world's markets for our products, burdens the consumer, and robs labor of its honest reward. It gives the American manufacturers and the trusts an enormous advantage, to which they are not entitled and by which they are to-day plundering the American people. The reason President Taft called this extra session of Congress was to pass this Canadian reciprocity and thereby partially relieve the American people from the unjust burdens of the Payne-Aldrich tariff law.

I do not mean to insinuate that the large cattlemen are in any way connected with the Beef Trust or are knowingly working in harmony with them. I do mean to say, however, that when we passed the Canadian reciprocity bill, putting all live animals on the free list, a lot of self-appointed farmers' friends let out a concerted and loud roar against us Democrats. They asserted that the American farmers do not eat cattle or sheep or hogs, but that they eat beef, pork, and mutton, and we were taunted with and accused of standing in with the Beef Trust by not also putting beef, pork, and mutton on the free list. Then, when we promptly called their bluff and passed the farmers' free-list bill, which includes meats among a hundred other articles, there was at once a terrific howl from the Beef Trust and all other trusts and all their satellites, including all the high protectionists in the country. The Beef Trust and the Lumber and Paper Trusts, some of the very people who ought to be in jail, are the ones that are now turning heaven and earth to prevent the passage of these bills—the very trusts which the United States Attorney General is now prosecuting and proving to be fraudulent monopolies and unlawful conspiracies against our Government and the American people. To me the bitter opposition of those monopolies is one of the most conclusive arguments in favor of these two measures.

This Canadian reciprocity agreement is not what the Democrats desire, and it is not an answer to the popular demand for tariff reduction. But it is a step in the right direction. And the best part of it is, it is an opening of the tariff wall that has for years surrounded our country. It is a break in the high-protection policy that will ultimately lead to its overthrow, and that is just what these monopolistic conspiracies fear. These bills are opposed by every trust in the country and by every special interest that has grown enormously rich by robbing the people. With brazen effrontery these trusts are now fighting the Canadian reciprocity and the free-list bill in the name of the American farmer and stockman, and at the same time the Steel Trust is compelling the American farmer and stockman to pay for his barbed-wire fences 50 per cent more than it charges the Canadian farmer for the same material.

I notice by the newspapers that the Steel Trust has just declared a dividend of $20,000,000 net profits during the first three months of this year. I suppose some of the critics of this bill would like to keep up the present subsidy and give that trust all the rest of the money in this country.

We sell to the world more than a thousand times as many agricultural implements as we buy from the world, and the Implement Trust sells its products lower almost everywhere on earth than in the United States to the American farmer. The Democrats are putting all of those implements on the free list. The Payne-Aldrich bill imposes a duty of 30 per cent on sewing machines, and yet these machines are sold by the Sewing Machine Trust at from six to seven dollars apiece less all over the world than the American housewife has to pay for them. We are also putting them on the free list. A few people are very much interested in having and trying to hold on to a monopoly of the salt business; we are wiping out that infamy by putting salt, an article that is absolutely necessary for human existence, on the free list.

The Payne-Aldrich bill put hides on the free list, and yet outrageously imposed a duty of from 5 to 45 per cent on boots and shoes, harness, leather, and manufactured products, which we export and sell in competition with the world to the enormous amount of $50,000,000 worth a year. We export 60 times as much as we import. No greater swindle has ever been perpetrated on the American people than that which has resulted in putting hides on the free list and leaving all that duty on those articles which enables the Leather Trust to continue to rob the American people and increase the prices. In the free-list bill we are putting all of the leather articles on the free list.

I have been studying these tariff questions almost constantly ever since I was first nominated to Congress nearly three years ago, and I have come to the conclusion that with all our marvelous modern developments, superior intelligence, wealth, and boundless resources our country has nothing to fear in the way of competition from any other nation, or all the nations, of the world. I am not a free trader. In fact, to a very limited extent, I am a protectionist. A reasonable amount of protection where it is actually necessary, at least temporarily, to build up a home industry or to protect American labor is undoubtedly wise and just. The trouble is that it seems to be an almost utter impossibility to tell where honest, deserving protection leaves off and robbery of the public begins. I am in favor of giving the people the benefit of the doubt. Our infant industries have been protected and practically subsidized until most of them have become giant monopolies. They need restraint instead of further subsidy. When we are compelled to raise very largely from tariff duties over three and a half million dollars a day to run this Government, there can be no such thing as universal free trade. That is entirely out of the question. Our country must raise the money for its needs, and our tariff duties, if fairly and intelligently adjusted on a purely revenue basis, will be amply high enough to afford all the protection that any legitimate industry deserves and that will also guarantee fair wages to our labor. In other words, I think we have reached the state of development in this country where we can secure all the incidental protection necessary on a purely tariff-for-revenue-only basis if it is fairly and equitably distributed.

Each of the hundreds of industries that is affected, or thinks it is affected, by these bills is loudly protesting against them. If Congress waits to gain the consent or receive the approval of the people who make money from the tariff rates, there will never be any revision. No tariff rate can ever be lowered if we consult only the judgment of the beneficiaries of the rates.

The Democratic Party promised to reduce the tariff, and there was no proviso or condition attached to the promise. The contest is between the common welfare of all the people and the beneficiaries of special legislation. In the last 10 years wages have increased 22 per cent, while the cost of the necessities of life have increased 60 per cent. The Payne-Aldrich bill gave the people no relief whatever.

About a half dozen men own or control something like 80 per cent of all the standing timber of this country. The Lumber Trust which they have formed has the 92,000,000 American people absolutely by the throat. There seems to be no limit to the insatiable greed of that monopoly. Prices, as everyone knows, have gone up from 200 to 500 per cent. Our timber and lumber supply in this country is not only rapidly diminishing, but practically all that is left of it of any value is monopolized and controlled. There is no other place to get lumber excepting from Canada. We absolutely must have lumber, and we must relieve the people from the increasing high prices, and the Canadians know it. This agreement practically puts lumber on the free list. The Canadians, however, are shrewd traders themselves, and they have been able to drive a fairly shrewd bargain with us before making these concessions. If we do not accept this agreement now, President Taft positively assures us that it will be many a long year and we will pay many billions of dollars into the pockets of the Lumber Trust and other trusts before we get another chance to enter into an agreement as advantageous as this with Canada.

We can not blame the newspapers of this country for wanting to wipe out the tariff and secure from Canada free wood pulp and print paper so as to get out of the clutches of the American Paper Manufacturers' Trust. Paper is one of the necessities of life. During the past five years, even with our high tariff against her, Canada has sold us $100,000,000 more paper, pulp, and lumber than we have sold her. Our present duty upon these articles has caused a very great wrong and hardship to every man, woman, and child in the United States. The people are robbed every day of their lives by the Lumber Trust and Paper Manufacturers' Trust. If we pass this reciprocity bill and remove the tariff against these products, Canada will sell us a vastly larger amount than $20,000,000 a year, and we will be able to get at a much more reasonable price the paper, lumber, and lumber products that are so necessary in our daily lives.

Of the 16,000,000 families in this country the homes of less than 5,000,000 are unencumbered by mortgages. The remaining 11,000,000 either have no homes or have mortgaged properties. The present price of lumber is prohibitive. People of moderate means can not build homes. We propose to at least partially throttle that lumber conspiracy by putting that product on the free list and try to make it easier for our people to own their homes.

As I have repeatedly stated, these bills are only the beginning of tariff reduction and of the general readjustment of the tariff. The tariff can not be reduced in one bill. The Republicans learned that to their sorrow two years ago, and President Taft has publicly and repeatedly stated that the only effective and practical way of revising the tariff is schedule by schedule, and the Democratic Party is going to undertake the task that way and attack these gigantic interests as far as possible single-handed. We must begin somewhere. The conditions in this country are radically wrong. The present tariff conditions breed discontent. High tariff is the citadel if not the mother of trusts, and protection has become the bulwark of monopoly. But we can not do everything at once. The Republican Party has been in control for 16 years and conditions have been getting worse every day. They have legislated in the interest of nearly everybody but the farmer. The very first bill the Democratic House introduced and passed as a Democratic measure is this farmers' free-list bill, and we feel as confident as possible that it will be a tremendous benefit to every farmer and stockman in this country, and will very largely reduce the middleman's enormous amount of unearned profit.

The minority of the Senate committee on wages and prices of commodities reported that there were three causes for the advanced food prices, and hence for the increase in the cost of living—first, the tariff; second, the trusts, combines, and monopolies; and, third, the increased money supply. Referring to these, the committee said:

> We are without sufficient data to apportion the degree of the proportion of responsibility among these three causes, but that the first two are the chief malefactors we have no doubt; and they are of our own creation.

President Taft has repeatedly said that the tariff is too high and that it tends to permit combines to advance prices. He has brought forward this Canadian reciprocity agreement in an earnest effort to remove some of the trade restrictions, hardships, and inequalities in the tariff, which he admits are unreasonable. As between this country and Canada, this agreement very largely removes them. I believe the removal of these false trade barriers will not only vastly enlarge our markets, but will broaden our source of supply and largely prevent the monopolies and trusts from controlling our prices.

If these two bills now pending in the Senate are passed, every farmer in the United States will be able to purchase not only all of his farm implements of every conceivable kind, but his lumber and nearly everything else that he buys cheaper than he now gets them. I earnestly believe that when the farmers and stockmen learn of the hundreds of articles that are included in those two bills and their far-reaching and beneficial effect, that they will heartily indorse them. . These two bills ought to pass as companion measures. They would benefit every man, woman, and child in the United States and injure nobody.

It is conservatively estimated by the expert agents of this Government and by the most prominent Democrats and Republicans in this country, whose knowledge of the tariff is as profound and thorough as anybody in the United States, that for the ten to fifteen million dollars of revenue which the Government would surrender by the passage of these bills the American people will receive at least $300,000,000 every year in direct benefits. Surely it would seem to me that, in the face of that showing, an inland State like Colorado ought to be willing to give the measure a trial, especially when the States bordering on Canada are not afraid of reciprocity, and several of their governors and many of their most prominent men have been here advocating it.

While these two measures are only two steps in the right direction, yet, if both of them are passed, they will very greatly relieve the oppressive tariff conditions now burdening the American people. I feel that we have legislated long enough against trade, one of the most important things that makes a nation industrially and financially great. The time has long gone by when the American people can live by trading among themselves. The campaign talk of 30 years ago about confining ourselves to our great home market is out of place to-day. The greatest need of the present is a larger market for our surplus products; and, if this country is to continue to prosper, we must sell a very large percentage of our products abroad. If we expect other people to buy our products, we must buy from them. Every nation, every State in this Nation, and every city in every State is spending millions of dollars in advertising and trying to enlarge and expand its trade, and each is especially trying to enlarge the markets for its products. Let us abandon the policy of exclusiveness and tariff retaliation and urge a spirit of commerce and friendly trade relations with all nations, and especially with the Canadians—our nearest and best neighbors.

The ranchmen and cattlemen of our State have always been my friends and professional and political supporters, and I earnestly hope that I may always deserve and retain their confidence. I have looked after their interests and represented them continuously for the past 15 years, and I certainly will never do anything in Congress that I believe will, or even might, injure them. I trust they will do me the favor of reading this letter, and then frankly decide, as I know they will, whether or not I have done wrong in standing by the party that has loyally stood by me and elected me to office during all of these years.

Pardon the great length of this letter. My only excuse is your statement that the stockmen of the country would be glad to know my opinion on these subjects, and acting upon your assurance that the letter will be published, I have taken the time to go into the matter somewhat in detail. Owing to the imperative press of official business I have been compelled to dictate this letter very hastily and with frequent interruptions and very little time for revision, consequently there are probably some repetitions and possibly some minor inaccuracies. But, in the main, it expresses my ideas based upon a diligent study of these tariff questions for the past two and a half years, and I frankly submit them to the candid judgment of the people of Colorado.

Yours, very respectfully, EDWARD T. TAYLOR.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT].

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, the object of this bill is to reduce taxes and to decrease the cost of living, and even though it may not accomplish all that its advocates claim for it, it is a long stride in the right direction, and I do not see how any Democrat, at least, can refuse to vote for it. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Whatever differences of opinion may exist among us as to the doctrine of free raw material should now be abandoned in the face of the facts with which we are now confronted. Perhaps the ideal Democratic tariff doctrine is a strictly revenue tariff upon every article of importation. But, Mr. Chairman, that is not the practical way in which to look at this question to-day. Every Republican, whether he be a regular or an insurgent, believes in the doctrine of protection and that that doctrine should not be abandoned. There are some Republicans who believe that the present tariff rates are too high; there are some Republicans who believe that the present rates are correct; there are some Republicans who think, I believe, that the rates are not now high enough. [Applause on the Democratic side.] But all Republicans agree that the doctrine of protection should be maintained. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Now, if the Democratic Party should undertake, when in control only of the House of Representatives, to adopt a general revenue bill based purely and primarily on Democratic lines and eliminating entirely the doctrine of protection, then a Republican Senate, composed of regulars and insurgents, would justify their opposition to such a measure by reason of the fact that it would mean the complete destruction of the doctrine of protection.

But the Republican Party, Mr. Chairman, is not opposed to the doctrine of free trade in some things. I am justified in making this statement by reason of the fact that in their purely protective tariff measures there is the free list. Therefore I want to congratulate the majority membership of the Committee on Ways and Means of the House in adopting a plan by which the tariff shall be revised by piecemeal as the only practical and sensible way in which it can now be accomplished. And there is another and a really good reason why the committee has adopted this plan, and that arises from the fact that it absolutely eliminates the trading and the bartering between special interests seeking special favors that have heretofore occurred in all the tariff legislation of this country. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

But, Mr. Chairman, there is another and a still more powerful reason why this plan of tariff revision adopted by the Ways and Means Committee of the House should be carried into effect. For something like one-half of a century the protective-tariff system has been thoroughly intrenched in the legislation of this country. Under this system gigantic fortunes have been concentrated in the hands of the favored few. In return for the vote of the American citizen who has been led under false pretenses to believe that the system brought about a general, but undefined, prosperity these gigantic interests, whose wealth has been accumulated by reason of the favoritism of the Government, have utilized this congested wealth by organizing trusts, and by means of these great trusts they levy, without even asking the aid of the Government, an additional tribute upon the American people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Whenever the representatives of the American people meet a situation like this there is but one thing to do, and that is to invite the foreign competitor of this concentrated and congested wealth power to come to America and compete with their exorbitant prices. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The only regret, Mr. Chairman, that I have about this bill, prepared by my good friend from Alabama, the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, is that it is not more extensive. But when I remember that the free markets of the world are by this bill opened to the American purchaser to buy agricultural implements, bagging and ties, boots, shoes, and leather, bread, crackers, and salt I do not see how many Representatives can stand before their people and defend an adverse vote upon this bill. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, there are four great enterprises that build up the material prosperity of every people. They are agriculture, commerce, navigation, and manufactures. It is a startling proposition to me that during all of these years in this free country, the freest country on the globe, one of these enterprises has been able to induce those who work in the other three to vote to tax themselves for the sole and exclusive benefit of the fourth. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Under this system of protection, for which I am justified in saying it is at least partly responsible, navigation has been abandoned on the high seas. Commerce has thrived to a greater or less extent because it was absolutely essential in the distribution of the products of the country and in bringing the buyer and seller together. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Agriculture has prospered with more or less ups and downs because of the abundance of our land and the fertility of our soil. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The last man on God's green earth who ought to vote for a high protective-tariff system is the tiller of the soil. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Under this system he is compelled to purchase everything he needs upon the farm and in the home in a highly protected and therefore a high-priced market, while the great surplus crop that he raises is sold in the free-trade markets of the world. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

And, Mr. Chairman, I want to say that the wage earner is no longer fooled by the claims of the advocates of this protective-tariff system. I do not propose to enter upon any statistical discussion of this question. Suffice it to say that the increase of wages has not kept pace with the prices of the things the laborer must buy. I want it to be understood—and I repeat what my good friend from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] elaborated the other day—that even the advocates of the protective-tariff system do not claim that it benefits any laborer, except those engaged in purely manufacturing pursuits. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The carpenter, the brick mason, the painter, the railroad employee, and thousands of other laborers throughout this country are not even pretended to be affected by a high protective tariff. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

But that is not all. Here occurs one of the most remarkable political phenomena that ever occurred in the history of any free people. Did you ever stop to think that the laboring man engaged in manufacturing pursuits is not himself by the law directly protected, although the industry in which he is engaged may be protected? The protection is given to the employer, and the employer is made the laboring man's guardian, without any compulsion of law or any obligation of contract to divide the spoils with his employee. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Yet they have appealed to the laboring men throughout this country, engaged in protected manufacturing pursuits, asking the laboring man to vote to give this artificial profit to his employer, and trust to God that his employer would give him some of the benefits. [Applause.] This is the system that is now beginning to find its end. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The American people have decided to repudiate it; there is no doubt about that. In my humble judgment there never has been a time in the whole history of the American people when there was not an overwhelming majority of the people with the Democratic Party upon the subject of low taxation and an economic administration of the Government. [Applause.] In 1876 Mr. Tilden received 250,000 plurality, although he was cheated out of the election. [Applause on the Democratic side.] In 1892 the Democratic Party swept the country from the east to the west on that issue. In 1908 both political parties went before the American people, demanding a downward revision of the tariff. [Applause.] The Republican Party forgot its anteelection pledges, and in 1910 a Democratic majority of 64 was returned to the House of Representatives. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, the Democratic Party believes in low taxation and an honest and economical administration of the Government, within constitutional limitations, in the sovereignty of the State, so far as their domestic affairs are concerned, in local self-government and the largest possible individual liberty consistent with the public good. [Applause on the Democratic side.] We believe that in a great country like ours, spread over such a vast territory, stretching from ocean to ocean, from Lakes to Gulf, embracing within its limits every variety of soil, climate, and production known to the Temperate Zone, and including among its people the representatives or their descendents of every civilized race on the globe, each with different thoughts, different tastes, different hopes, different aspirations, and, what is more important, different interests, that out of this heterogeneous mass there can be molded and maintained one homeogenous whole only by remaining true to the principles upon which our fathers builded this Republic. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. LANGLEY].

[Mr. LANGLEY addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. FAISON].

[Mr. FAISON addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BOWMAN].

Mr. BOWMAN. Mr. Chairman, it is late Saturday afternoon of the second week which this House, in my judgment, has spent in chasing a will-o'-the-wisp, and yet I have been very much interested in the debate. It is a great privilege to be a Member of this House. It might be called a liberal education to listen to what these Members have to say upon such an important question as the tariff. I also consider it a great privilege to represent an important part of the greatest State in this Union, the State of Pennsylvania, the richest crown that adorns the brow of nature, and the district from which I come the brightest gem in that diadem, the heart of the anthracite coal region of Pennsylvania, the county of Luzerne. It seems to be quite the fashion for the Members of this House to inveigh against the industries of the State of Pennsylvania. Do they realize what that State is doing for this Union? Do they realize that that State produced, according to the census of 1905, one-seventh of the wealth of this country—upward of $2,000,000,000? Do they realize what the State of Pennsylvania is doing with that money? Do they realize that they are supporting the country directly by purchasing the products raised in all parts of this Union and by sending to the south, to the east, to the west, and to the north money to help carry on its multitudinous enterprises? I may be permitted to say a few words regarding the character of the people of the district which I have the honor to represent.

They are one of the most industrious, independent, and progressive of which this country can boast. They are Republicans to-day and Democrats to-morrow; they can not be deceived by any such bill as that which is before this House to-day. I will take the opportunity now of sending to the Clerk's desk an uninspired editorial printed in the Wilkes-Barre Record, one of the most important newspapers in the State of Pennsylvania or in this Nation, one that does not support a man because he is a Republican or because he is a Democrat, but supports those men and those principles which they believe are for the best interests of this country.

The Clerk read as follows:

SCHEDULE BY SCHEDULE.

In the course of his address in New York City last week President Taft again characterized the old method of tariff revision as antiquated and rife with abuse. The opinion he expressed, that there is now general sentiment in favor of making revision dependent upon exact information as to each schedule, is not overdrawn. The Payne law is not what it should be, largely because there was lack of definite information as to the extent to which duties might be reduced. Congressmen were primarily interested in giving adequate protection to the products of their respective sections of the country, but without knowing just how much protection was needed they felt more inclined to err on the side of overprotection than underprotection. In the confusion some reactionaries allied with the special interests took advantage of the situation to demand duties in excess of what they knew were adequate. But as to the main body of Republicans, they were completely at sea. If mistakes were made, they were due to the absence of plain facts and figures in relation to the schedules upon which they were called to vote.

This haphazard system has prevented fair and square revision in the past and it will prevent it so long as the system is continued. Insurgents who clamored for downward revision and expressed their indignation over the Payne enactment because it did not go far enough, are now clamoring against the reciprocity agreement because sectional interests have more weight with them than the general welfare. They oppose reciprocity because they fear that it will seriously injure the farming constituencies which they represent. At the time of the last general revision certain Democrats were heart and soul in favor of reducing the tariff on everything produced outside of their own districts. These were the Democrats who took the hazard of expressing their honest stand. Others were spared from fighting reduction owing to the knowledge that there would be no attempt at reducing the old rates on their home products.

The President has raised an issue as between the old method of revision and the method which gives Congressmen and the Nation information as to the differences between the cost of production at home and abroad and all other information necessary for safe judgment. When such facts and figures are presented there will be no excuse for voting blindly. Congressmen will not be able to take advantage of a confused situation in order to stand pat for their sectional interests. It will be known just to what extent each schedule may be safely reduced. In advocating such a system the President is right and the Nation is with him.

Mr. BOWMAN. I would ask the Members of this House if this bill is in any sense in conformity with the very wise statements of that editorial? I declare that it is not, and I also declare, without fear of contradiction, that there are not a dozen Members present who, taken individually, consider this a wise measure. It certainly is not just. Most of you can reason with an individual, and most of you have had sufficient experience with men to know that it is oftentimes impossible to reason with a crowd.

This bill does not show sufficient consideration, either for the character of the Democratic Party or for the people of this country. It is neither wise nor just.

That I may not appear inclined to favor my own State or the industries of my own State I will call attention to a letter which most of you have received from the Carolina Bagging Co. Investigation shows me that the bagging industry has invested upward of $11,000,000. They employ over 6,000 people. It is located entirely in the Southern States. This letter, to the speaker, who has had some experience in business if not in politics, is absolutely touching.

There are now seven bagging factories in North Carolina, three in South Carolina, three in Virginia, and three in Georgia. Large amounts of capital are invested in these. Admitting jute bagging into this country free of duty would ruin and close these factories and throw all their labor out of employment.

The Member from North Carolina in whose district this factory is located stated to me, upon inquiry, that the effect of this bill upon that factory would be to close it and result in the probable ruin of that enterprise. I looked up the credit rating of these people. It was given me as first class. I believe they are honest men and tell the truth when they say:

The duty on cotton bagging, which is made of jute, is about 30 cents per roll. With this small amount of protection manufacturers of bagging and other jute products have had a hard time to live for the last few years. Several factories have failed and gone out of business.

* * * * * * *

Take this from our earnings and we could not go on at all, and would close our factory. May God forbid such a result. We and our help all cry to Congress to forbid it.

I went through an experience in connection with the Wilson bill as a business man that I shall never forget. I had just fairly started in business. The anthracite coal business is very similar to the farming industry. It is intimately dependent upon the industrial growth and progress of the country. When the wheels stop and no smoke comes from the furnaces the mines are idle. I saw long strings of men, women, and children leading up to the soup house. They were taken care of. There is never a hungry child in the anthracite coal district of Pennsylvania, whatever may be stated to the contrary on the other side of this or any other House. The miners there are paid better wages than any others in the world. There have been slurs cast upon the bituminous mining system of Pennsylvania as to the wages paid. There are peculiar conditions surrounding that industry, and, understand, I have no commission to speak for the bituminous region of Pennsylvania. But justice is justice.

I wish to speak from the report of the Immigration Commission relative to the condition of immigrants in the bituminous coal fields of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from North Carolina, I think it was, presented here a voucher showing that some mine worker had been paid a few dollars for 10 days' work. That hand specimen was unfair to the State of Pennsylvania and not fair to himself. The average earnings of all classes of daily wage earners in the Pennsylvania bituminous mines in 1909 was $2.07. The daily average paid the native American was $2.18. The average daily earnings of the Welsh was $2.43. It is true that some of the foreigners do not earn as large wages, but the foreign-born average for the year was $442 a family.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. BOWMAN. The investigation of the experts connected with this report shows to me that the bituminous miners of Pennsylvania receive from 20 to 40 per cent more wages than the average paid for the total labor of the southern part of this country.

Now, gentlemen, I am not talking for north, south, east, or west. I have an interest in the Southland—as much as any of you can have. My only daughter, with husband and two grandsons, lives in the State of Alabama, and I have some of my hard-earned money invested there. Should I not be interested in the development of that country as I am also in that of my own State and of each State in the Union? And I say to you, gentlemen, with all seriousness, ponder well before you pass this bill. Ponder well. And I will make a prediction, that before 10 or 15 years pass this House will have from that Southland as ardent supporters of the principle of protection, as it is understood in my State, as you now have from Pennsylvania. We believe in protection to the limit of competition, with a small percentage to protect from surplus stocks. We believe in a revision of the tariff. We believe that if any industry is protected and does not give labor a fair share of the return we should withdraw from that industry its protection.

Now, gentlemen, there have been slurs cast against the manufacturing industries of the State of Pennsylvania, notably those of Pittsburg. They produce a large share of that $2,000,000,000 of which I told you. They do not keep it all in Pittsburg. What is Pittsburg doing for the Tennessee Coal & Iron Co.? It is furnishing the money and the brains to rehabilitate it and put it in a position so as to make Alabama some day a second Pennsylvania.

Gentlemen, if shoes are put on the free list, why not sugar? This bill means millions for nothing. Reciprocity means something for something. If the revenues of this country are reduced by the amount that is contemplated in this bill, can this country perform its duty to the veterans?

It was stated by a Member on this floor that there were no farmers in my district. There are as good farmers, working as good farms, in my district, as are found anywhere in this country, and they want the mines to work so that there will be a market for their crops. They are patriots and have furnished, as defenders of this country, from the War of the Revolution down to the Spanish War, as great a proportion or a greater proportion of volunteers than any other part of this Union. They depend upon this Government to care for them in their old age, and I appeal to you, gentlemen, that the revenues of this country should not be reduced when they are deserving aid, and expecting to be cared for at this time.

Now, just a word more. I have two telegrams here which I have received. There are in my district two lace-curtain factories which are using cotton. I telegraphed to them and have received the following responses to my inquiry as to the amount of cotton used daily and their product of finished goods. Here they are:

WILKES-BARRE, PA., May 5, 1911.

Mr. C. C. BOWMAN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

Maximum daily consumption cotton 2,500 pounds; market value annual output approximately $800,000.

WYOMING VALLEY LACE MILLS.

WILKES-BARRE, PA., May 5, 1911.

Hon. C. C. BOWMAN,
Congressman, Washington, D. C.:

We use daily 10,000 pounds of cotton and produce 10,000 pairs of curtains per day.

WILKES-BARRE LACE MANUFACTURING CO.

Is it better, I ask, Mr. Chairman, to sell that cotton in this country and support the American farmer and miner and an American industry or pay the freight upon the cotton to the other side and the freight back on the finished goods and also support a foreign industry? [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. GARDNER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. GARDNER] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I shall not discuss in detail the tariff in general or protection as affected by this bill. Tariff discussion is about perpetual; it increases periodically from near zero, and commands attention only as often as death and forgetfulness remove from view the wrecks of former consideration and destructive action.

It was not my good fortune in youth, or at any other time, to be apprenticed to a mathematical tailor shop, where I might acquire the facility to fashion from the cloth a statistical garment that would precisely fit any economic proposition and dress it appropriately for presentation on any occasion at hand. Nor shall I inquire very closely into figures in search of the comparative "cost of manufacture at home and abroad." Much has been said about this platform expression. My interpretation of it is, a tariff under which the present standard of American living and American wages shall not be broken down. [Applause on the Republican side.] If it has any other interpretation, pray what is it? Where is this place called "abroad"?

It is not named on any map. Is it "any old place" outside of the United States? If so, for the purpose of a computation of the "difference in cost at home and abroad" there are a number of "abroads." For instance, England, Germany, and France all manufacture pottery and export it into the United States. But it is manufactured at one cost in England, another in Germany, and another in France. Which is the "abroad"? Now, does any gentleman pretend here that the difference in cost at home and abroad is not to be measured in large part by the American wage, the American standard of living, the American environment, the American way that has become a necessary way to American life, if you please? So, for myself, I repeat that this is my standard of interpretation of the Republican pledge. Certainly we must mean something with some stability, something in some degree permanent.

The difference in cost, measured by arithmetic, would never be the same probably in any two months. An increase in wages here or a decrease there would change the relative difference in that cost. Indeed, gentlemen who insist upon a rigid arithmetical interpretation must be ardent advocates of a tariff commission with full power to act at once and often, and with an Atlantic cable in their control, for it would be necessary to ascertain at least every Monday morning what that difference was and to adjust the United States tariffs accordingly.

I have noticed that the gentlemen favoring even the proposed free list are possessed, and naturally so, with some anxiety to dissipate the well-founded belief that tariffs materially affect the wages and the amount of labor engaged in the various occupations here. I noticed yesterday that my colleague from New Jersey [Mr. McCOY] quoted standard authority for the proposition that the tariff can not increase wages.

To-day the same proposition has been insisted upon, and I want to do my friend from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM] the justice to say that in so far as I know he is the only gentleman who, in this entire debate, has acknowledged any force whatever in the old "law of supply and demand." Now, it is a truism that a tariff can not raise wages, if you assume a world-wide equality of conditions. It is probably true that equal tariffs could not affect wages, if all the world was equally situated and each nation had its own tariff equal with every other. It may also be a truism under many other assumptions. It is, however, an absurdity—if increase means to prevent reduction—when applied to a country living on a higher plane as against countries whose standard of life and pay is on a lower plane. An unlimited supply of anything made in a country where labor is cheap reduces the price, under the law of supply and demand.

People will pay no more for the thing made for high wages than if made for low wages. The low prices thus brought about must ultimately reduce wages or close the factory in the higher-paid workman's country. I know of nothing more futile in this world, Mr. Chairman, than the attempted application of even an unimpeachable philosophic conclusion to conditions that it will not fit. I say to our friends that they can not now spread over this country a general doubt that the tariff has developed our manufactures and has aided in making the trade balances favorable and contributed greatly to the national growth, wealth, strength, and prosperity. You may confuse the reason of the young operatives in the factory, but you can not confuse the recollections of the older ones.

You can not erase from their memory the days of idleness, the specter of gaunt poverty, nor will they forget the defaulted building association dues, the lost homes, the general disaster of your former experiments. I had intended to say, before my friend from Maryland spoke to-day, that in all the economic discussion that it has been heretofore my fortune to hear the law of supply and demand had been considered a very respectable authority and treated with marked consideration. Propositions going to the increase or decrease of the supply were subjected to the scrutiny of that law, and the probable effect on price was thereby determined.

So far as I know, until to-day no advocate of the reciprocity bill has paid even "the cold respect of a passing glance" to that law. True, the whole contention that reciprocity would reduce the cost of living must have rested upon the operation of the law unless it be simply a provision against possible famine due to untimely frosts in the country south of Canada. We were diverted rather to statistical exhibits calculated to show that the desired result would not be attained.

I know of no other instance in the history of parliamentary contests where there occurred a serious division on the question of whether products could be cheapened without lowering the price. In the discussion of the pending bill, also, no consideration has been given at all until to-day to the effect of this law's operation when the goods so admitted are here on the ground and when the American price will be fixed by the foreign competitor—unless new combinations prevent.

Mr. Chairman, the bill under consideration is known as the farmers' free-list bill, has been known so here in Washington and throughout the United States, understood to be such wherever notice of the parliamentary proceedings of this great Nation is taken. It has been understood that it was a sister craft of reciprocity, and we have been told to-day for the first time, and much applause was elicited by the apparent afterthought, that even though the reciprocity boat should "hit upon the unseen rock" or founder in the hurricane of debate, the other boat would sail to its destination. Both are freighted with disaster. The two bills are an admitted attempt at special legislation, and special legislation of a kind, too, adjudged to be contrary to public policy in some of the States and forbidden by the constitutions of other States in which the legislation is to operate.

Since when has the farmer been a subject of outlawry by the Government on the one hand or entitled to either real or pretended special privilege on the other? When did the condition arise under which his segregation is not insult and his specialization outrage? He above all others is professedly opposed to both special privilege and special legislation. What kind of a defense is it of this bill to say that the farmer has been especially penalized, and now you offer him special privileges in recoupment? If you believe he is entitled to recoupment, what right had you to do him the special injury? If you did not do him special wrong, what warrant is there to grant him special favor? When did the farmer cease to be an American citizen subject to the equal protection of the laws and to none other?

Of course you do not offer him benefits in this bill. You say you do. You think you do because you think wrong on the tariff. Upon the whole the farmer is a loser by your free list. You propose to heal the wound made by one blow by "hitting him again."

But if you believe the free list would help the farmer, why not give it to him with equal certainty with which you give him the first blow—reciprocity? This is too serious a matter; it raises questions too momentous to be deliberately and deeply involved in the game of politics. [Applause on the Republican side.] The purpose can not be hidden. The veil is too gauzy; the sagacity of the farmer and the people even less directly concerned will penetrate it with the simplicity of an X ray on something thin. Is it hoped to plead successfully that you sought to soften the injustice done by an administration measure? The farmer will know that if you had not made it your measure it would not have passed the House. Do you hope to win him by the soothing statement that you had to support the reciprocity bill because it was in line with your policies, but you still thought it necessary to break the injurious force of the policy? You can not tell him that you believe he should both sell and buy in a free-trade market, because you had it in your power to give him both together or neither.

It will be no defense to say that believing he should have both you gave him one, even though you pass your free-list bill through the House and put the question of giving him the other—your beneficial measure—up to somebody else. The so-called reciprocity with Canada is bad enough and plays havoc with the agricultural interests of this country, but it plays an honest havoc, honest if inexcusable as a policy, honest as a revenue-tariff havoc would be if the Democratic Party could follow out its own convictions. But a reciprocity bill, with a farmers' free list as a supplement, not only assaults and wounds the farmer's interests but inexcusably insults his intelligence. It is a mock expression of good will. It says, "We struck you because we thought we could escape responsibility and direct your resentment to another. We admit the injury, but we have the balm that will cure. Whether the balm shall be applied or not, we will leave to those who say that they do not believe you are injured at all."

The sands in the glass at the desk are running, and I must omit much and hasten on.

Mr. Chairman, we have beyond doubt during the last two or three weeks been favored with one of the most splendid symposiums that has gone into political literature. It is true that more, in the form of prophecy, has gone into the current volume of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD than is contained in any volume yet given to the world, and probably with less warrant of inspiration than excuses the existence of any former volume. True it is, too, that party has assaulted party, that crimination and recrimination have been heard. High tariff has been assaulted and low tariff has been denounced, until, if the air waves travel as indicated by the success of the wireless, we may well believe that wherever around the globe there is an echo a present ear would hear "robber," "plunder," "trusts," "panic," "poverty," "the ruin wrought," and so on; yet it remains true that there has been debate of a high order and the presentation of important facts—the evidence of diligent, if misdirected, research.

And yet, as I comprehend the subject matter before the House, the real questions involved have not been even stated for consideration. The questions are not of tariffs, or reciprocity, or closer commercial relations with Canada. All these are incidental and to be determined according to which way we resolve the main question.

Has the time come when the United States should enter upon a new agricultural extension in another country, only less disastrous to existing agriculture in extent, but no less in kind, than that which occurred to the East in "winning the West?" Has our population so grown, has our demand for foodstuffs become so great that our agriculture can not supply it; or have our farmers so far fallen below the ability to produce an adequate supply that there is now a national necessity for a new agricultural extension and development, even though the United States must become a party to its accomplishment, under another flag? These are the questions to be met and discussed in advance of intelligent action by Congress; and if the answers be in the affirmative, I submit that the wise procedure is not by way of what we call the "pact" or "reciprocity." With the questions involved answered in the affirmative, the "pact" is neither broad enough in scope nor secure enough in tenure to meet the requirements. If the questions be not resolved in the affirmative—if the necessity does not exist—then the agricultural interests of the country should not be disturbed and a third of all our people made subject to depression and loss—a third of our people should not have their well-being exposed to the hazard of an unnecessary experiment.

The analysis of the question whether the United States should now become a party to a new agricultural extension in another country by treaty involves the discussion of many questions, some of which we very properly seek to avoid. I take it that if there be no national necessity for it, if none should be shown, the proposition would stand at the end of such consideration as a mere proposal to throw our agricultural interests into confusion, subject them to depression, discourage internal development for the benefit of others, for no reason better than an impulse to do something—execute a diversion, make a new mark on the map of the world. This movement would, I think, stand alone in the history of national movements as an attempt to divert development away from the home flag, divert immigration to a field of competition with us and before such competition is necessary; to build and strengthen elsewhere at the expense of home. But if it be necessary, if the time has come when we need it, if our agricultural resources be not ample, then a further development should be sought more under our control, where we could not be deprived of its benefits whenever and under whatever circumstances a rival power should elect.

The more we are brought to a state of dependence upon resources not under our control the weaker our position. If the broader and deeper questions involved were, diplomatically speaking, open for discussion now it would be pertinent to inquire at some length whether we are not quite possibly putting the Nation into a position where the maximum of supply will be available in times of minimum need and only the minimum supply be available to meet the maximum of requirement. The higher wisdom of policies is brought to test only in the crisis. If the Canadian pact develops a notable tendency, it will be in the direction of a United States dependence upon these foreign fields.

Mr. Chairman, the discussion of reciprocity here has not indicated mental views confined to the business relations between the United States and Canada. There have been visions of prospective which, while shadowy and undefined, have yet been inspiring and influential to many advocates of the measure. I wish the matter could have been considered in the absence of the unrelated lights and shades which, while not on the canvas, have added greatly to, if not controlled, the estimate of value of the picture itself.

There has certainly been enough of this influence apparent to remove the pact from comparison with any other proposition for reciprocal trade and to remove it from the light of contemplation as a cold business matter—enough of it to destroy the notion that if its workings be to our business disadvantage it can be denounced like other treaties. There seems present in everyone's vision a line of Americans going into Canada by the invitation of the treaty, a severing from all the United States except its markets, the establishment of homes over there. When 100,000 or 200,000 American farmers have accepted the invitation and gone there and located there, you can no more withdraw the treaty than Congress can withdraw the rainbow from the sky. If now, it is forever—or complication.

The sentiment to which I allude has been so marked that the matter in this discussion of which the world at large has most taken note, and probably the only matter that history will note at all, is found in the romantic expressions about the United States farmers' influence in Canada tending to bring the two countries into such close and intimate connections that we may suppose two flags will become embarrassing. Something of this has gone permanently into the record. There is apparent a belief, not narrowly confined, that the United States citizen is going to settle in Canada; that he will exert a United States influence; that his sentiment will be infectious, if not contagious. It seems almost assumed that by and by Uncle Sam, with Miss Canada's consent, with apply to the Court of St. James for letters of legal adoption.

There has been some expression almost poetical and some heroic of the way this new addition was to be made, presumably to the sisterhood of States. And the farmer again is the instrumentality by which it is all to be brought about. Strange there should be so much of romance hovering about what the farmer believes to be the sacrifice of his well being.

I am at a loss to classify this imagined sentimental filibuster. It seems to be safely outside the condemnation of international law, because unorganized and without arms; still it has been made apparent that there is a wide-spread feeling among the advocates of reciprocity that the people of the United States are going into Canada. That reciprocity means expatriation and in no small way, and that somehow, in some undefined way, and undesignated time, the expatriated sons are going to bring both countries under one flag. That may be an inspiring sentiment to those who have no thought of going, and who do not attempt an analysis of it. But how does it seem to those who think they may go, or may have to go? Do they contemplate going as propagandists of annexation? Will they go for the purpose of extending our domain? Do they think of becoming disturbers of the King's peace? Will reciprocity inspire them with the notion that we have an inviting regard for the farmer's interest? Does he who goes from under a flag to better his fortunes, believe that all the world's opportunity is behind him?

Mr. Chairman, I allude to the existence of this sentiment chiefly to point out that we have not yet settled to a mood to consider "soberly and in cold reason" the proposition before the country. The dream will not come true. False visions should not be taken as an inspiration or a guide to statesmanship.

They will go first who are least reluctant to leave. And if the reluctant are forced out, will not the "tie that binds" be broken?

The sentiment that hovers about this question rises not in fact from the prospects of new glories to come of bloodless conquest or of expanding national greatness. It is rather a sentiment of sadness. Before us will stand a great, and this time unpredatory, interest, the interest that fills the world's granaries and feeds its teeming millions, depressed, if not discouraged, under a sense of wrong treatment, disregard, and adverse discrimination. Beyond will lie an almost boundless domain, to be settled and devoted to production that will come into competition with that interest as fast as it becomes profitable to compete. The end will not be seen by any man now living. Hope of relief from the new agricultural depression will be only for a generation yet unborn. Our farmers will go into Canada, perhaps, to recoup on rising values there the shrinkage they suffer here. How magnificent the prospect!

For myself, instead of imagining the United States farmer going into Canada, by reason of the reciprocity pact, with a heart fired with sentiment for annexation, I can more easily picture him as bidding farewell to his flag with feelings, in some cases, tinged with bitterness. If he be one who went West from the East because of the depression there, brought about by the expansion which has peopled the West, he may feel like couching his good-by in terms somewhat as follows:

"Flag of the free," farewell! I am invited to expatriate. Columbia hath regard for all her children, save her farmer son; for him she hath not regard. Yet I was born in the glint of thy glory, and have worshipped thee above all else, only God. My fathers, I, or my sons have been with thee in the rage of battle, in every war of thine, since "American liberty raised its first voice." Without murmur I sacrificed much that thou shouldst float over a broader, more diversified, self-sustained, and free country. When inspiration was given to the sentiment of agricultural extension by the cry of "Free homes for free men" and thy fair domain of matchless fertility was given almost as free as heaven gives the air, alike to the stranger and those born beneath thy folds, I thought only of thy expanding domain, increasing strength, and glory. When this agricultural expansion bore heavily upon me and subjected me to increasing penury, I obeyed the mandate, "Go West and grow up with the country." Gathering my family about me, with heavy hearts and with tears, but not without hope, we bade good-by to our civilization, and took the trail for the unbroken lands far toward the sunset, but not beyond thy dominion.

My neighbors were in like manner reduced, and they followed, and none for many years took their places. The vixen reared her young on the abandoned hillside farms of New England, and they made hiding places of what had been the plenteous storehouses of the farmers. Vanishing equities from under a million depreciating incumbrances proclaimed the cost of agricultural expansion to the farmers elsewhere. Out here in our new homes, after years of pioneer hardships, slow-moving civilization has come to us. I have moderately prospered, and have been a proud American citizen. Proud of our growing agricultural greatness, proud of the increasing manufactures of my country, and still felt that American liberty and equality was man's first best estate in this world. Star-Spangled Banner, there has been ever present with me the thought: The flag that floats over the German is the flag of the Kaiser; the flag that inspires the Englishman is the flag of His Majesty; but thou, thou art my flag.

I am now told of a new propaganda—that the unmeasured domain of Canada must be developed and brought into our agricultural expansion, that the wheels of manufacture may run more cheaply, and the "cost of doing business be decreased." I must again take the consequences of a new agricultural development. The expense will be great, but the farmer again must pay it all, even though the expansion be, this time, under another flag. If the cost be too great, we are told we can sell our homesteads on a falling market and "go North and grow up with the country." Again we can leave civilization and again seek new homes, this time under bleaker skies, on the plains of British North America, swept by more frosty winds. It may seem strange to find myself at last pushed on to where I should sit through the rendering of the American anthem, but needs rise and bow my head reverently to the swelling notes of "God save the King."

"Flag of the free heart's hope and home," thou wert by hands of gods to valor given. The god of battles commanded valor to fight, when needs be, to the last drop of red blood for thee, the country, and its people. The goddess of liberty commanded that the land and the people under the flag should be protected in all things that make for their freedom, their prosperity, and their happiness. The goddess of justice sternly forbade that the people of any honorable occupation should ever be segregated and thrust without the pale of equal protection of the laws. The commands have been disobeyed, the trust imposed has been betrayed, and I am invited to depart, that some other people may be more prosperous and happy under my flag.

For decency's sake I will put in concealment my emblems of membership in the society of the Sons of the American Revolution and other patriotic associations. For this, however, solace is to be found in the thought that when my grandchildren shall have "grown up with the country" and civilization shall have again encompassed them, they may organize the "Patriotic Association of First Comers by the Reciprocity Trail." I go with heart even more heavy that many of my countrymen suggest that thou, flag, may come, too, and again float over me in the new land. They suggest that we who go will beckon thee and long for thy coming. Oh, why could not the farmer be permitted to accept exile without casting after him the imputation that he will seek the protection of the British flag, while harboring in his American heart treason to His Majesty's emblem? Why, instead of a Godspeed, a proclamation of his baseness?

But the farmer, under any flag, will still have equal permission to petition the Throne of Grace and Power, and will pray that the legitimate and natural consequences of the error by which he is now smitten shall not be permitted to fall upon this country. That the markets of her well-paid producing people shall not become the unprotected foraging ground of a world's greed; that her industries shall not lie prostrate and her impoverished people sit in idleness; that her factory yards shall not be overgrown with weeds and the dwelling places of the workman be abandoned to the owls. But—Flag—Farewell!

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. REES].

Mr. REES. Mr. Chairman, we are told by our Democratic friends that the people have repudiated the Republican Party and with it the doctrine of protection, and the advocates of free trade are urging the immediate passage of this so-called farmers' free-list bill, not because it is all the free trade they propose to give us, but they hand this to us with an apology because it is all they have ready to offer now.

The country did rebuke the Republican Party at the last election. It did deprive the Republicans of control in this Chamber, and it is well for us to recognize that there was an adequate cause for this political upheaval. Did the country mean that the doctrine of protection was obsolete and that, reversing the great policy which it had followed with some interruptions for a hundred years, it had set its face squarely toward free trade? I do not believe it. I do not believe that the tariff, vastly important though it was and still is, was the problem uppermost in the minds of the people. I believe that trust control concerned them more. Indeed, I believe that the interest felt in the tariff was because it was felt that monopoly was sometimes sheltering itself behind our revenue laws.

From the days of Hamilton the country has been told by all the great advocates of protection that, though a tariff were higher than necessary to afford protection, if an evil at all it was but a temporary one, because, while it might afford an opportunity for the home producers to raise their prices higher than they ought to be, this could not long be the case, for the alluring prospect for larger profits—the very attractiveness of the proposition to the home producer—would result in competition at home and this home competition would soon bring the price down to the level of the foreign market, or at least to the point where only a fair profit could be realized here. And for a century of our national existence this theory was justified by experience.

Hamilton and his followers correctly interpreted the natural law that would govern trade under ordinary circumstances, but they did not have the prescience to foresee that in the twentieth century the concentration of wealth would have proceeded so far that by combinations in restraint of trade all real home competition would in many lines be done away with. But while these great men could not foresee this, because it was impossible for mortal man to foresee the marvelous development in the effectiveness of modern machinery or the wonderful advancement in the means of transportation or the vast fortunes that would grow out of the phenomenal development along these lines, the people of this country for the last decade have been forced to see it.

And, seeing the menacing power of vast wealth when combined to suppress home competition, the people became aroused to the danger to their economic liberties, and they have decreed that there must be competition somewhere, if not at home, because that has been throttled, then there must be competition from abroad.

If I understand the American people, they have not repudiated the doctrine of protection. They realize that under the beneficent influence of legislation enacted in accordance with that theory this Republic has prospered for the last 50 years as no nation in the history of the world ever prospered before. They know that more people are employed at better wages in this country now than at any other period in our national life. To my mind the result of the last election indicates a lack of confidence in the Republican Party rather than a vote of confidence in the Democratic Party—a failure to approve a particular application of the doctrine of protection rather than an abandonment of the doctrine itself.

It is not because the American people have been crushed by combinations that they recoil from the extreme application of the doctrine of protection. They are wise; they foresee the danger menaced rather than the injury felt, and seeing it they wish to ward off the danger that they feel would come from carrying the principle of combination too far. They saw this evil in 1908, and it was because they did see it that they became uneasy about a tariff on trust-made articles and began wondering if this tariff were not in many instances too high; if the shield that had been given to protect the infant industries had not, since they had grown powerful because of it, been used as a cloak under which they could, after stifling home competition, extort an unjust tribute from the people.

The Republican Party, to meet this condition of the public mind, promised to revise the tariff, and its platform, taken in connection with the public declarations of its presidential candidate, led the people to believe that it contemplated a thoroughgoing revision of the tariff, so that the protection afforded would no longer measure more, or at least but slightly more, than the difference in the cost of production of like articles at home and abroad. The American people were satisfied with this promise as thus interpreted, and once more intrusted the grand old party with power, and it did revise the tariff, but this measure did not meet the expectations of the people, for a large measure of protection was still afforded on the articles made by the trusts, much more, the people thought, than would measure the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad. And the American people spoke once more, and so you are here, my Democratic brethren, not because the people at this election indorsed your theory of a tariff but because the people administered a rebuke to the Republican Party for not having been true to theirs.

You passed the Canadian reciprocity measure through this House the other day, just as you had agreed to do in your caucus, but in passing that bill you did not answer any demand of the American people. They were complaining of the extortionate prices which combinations had made it possible to exact for trust-made articles, and you passed a bill that would give these combinations a larger market without reducing the tariff as to their products, but you removed all protection from the farmers on their wheat and potatoes and cheese and other farm products, although these farmers have never been in any combination to enhance prices and have never received more than a reasonable compensation for the things they had to sell. And now you are offering the country this free-list bill. It contains some good features, and I may vote for it, but I would like to amend it first.

I am willing that you lower the duty on meats, if it is found that there is a greater rate now charged than measures the difference in the cost of production in this country and in Argentina, but I do not want to vote for free trade in dressed meats.

The Beef Trust very largely controls the price of meats, and I have no use for that combination and would like to see it regulated; indeed, I would like to see it dissolved and true competition restored. But not every blow aimed at the Beef Trust will hit that monopoly. Where does it get the beef it sells to the American consumer? From the American farmer and stock raiser. It does not pay him all that he ought to receive, nevertheless his industry has prospered. If you strike down this protection, you will not have injured the trust very much, for it operates in the Argentine, and it will buy its cattle there and ship the dressed meat to America to compete with the like articles produced on American soil. While not crippling the trust very much, you will have struck a telling blow to the American stockmen.

I am for free trade in the necessities of life where we can not produce them here, and I am for free trade where we can produce them here on even terms with the producers abroad; but I am not for free trade where we can not do this. I am not for free trade where it would bring our highly developed farms into competition with the vast undeveloped plains of South America.

Stock raising, either for meat or dairy purposes, is the keystone to the arch in successful agriculture. The concentration of the products of the farm into meat or dairy products and returning the waste to the land preserves the fertility of the soil. Upon the conservation of this fertility depends the future of our agriculture.

Corn is one of the great agricultural products of the country; it is wasteful to ship it to great distances; it should be fed on the farm or in the neighborhood where it is produced. If you injure the stock feeder, you will strike a blow at the farmer who raises the corn that feeds his stock, and in the end you will not have any cheaper meat. The trust may buy cheaper, but will not sell cheaper.

I am from the great agricultural State of Kansas, and by virtue of a constitutional provision we can not convert our corn into liquid form as they do in Kentucky.

We are asked to surrender our splendid market for the products of our agriculture that we may build cheaper houses with the lumber which is put on the free list in this bill, but we will not need to build many houses if you destroy our agriculture.

I am for tariff reform, but not for free trade. I am for reducing the tariff till it measures but slightly more than the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad. If, according to this test, we do not need a tariff on the importation of any article the like of which we produce in this country, why, then, I want to put it on the free list. If, according to this test, we do not need protection on our meats or our cereals, put them on the free list. Our friends assure us that there is no difference now, but does anybody know that there is not? What investigation have you made? The facts are apparently against your theory. The boundless range of South America, it seems, can produce cheaper beef than we can, and you want to let the Beef Trust get that meat into the American market without the necessity of paying any tariff.

I want to see a genuine revision of the tariff, but I want that revision made consistent with the theory of reasonable protection to the American producers. Free trade has an alluring sound, but it is like the mirage on the desert. One may pursue it hoping to reach cool water and pleasant fields, but the vision will elude him and it will lead the deluded wanderer farther into the waste of blistering sands, there to perish of thirst, while the sight of water seems ever before him.

Many of the things mentioned in this bill ought to be on the free list, according to the Republican theory, and I am willing to put them there, but in order to get the sugar coating I do not want to swallow the bitter pill.

I do not ask any special favor for my district; all I ask is a square deal. I want you to remember that it costs more to produce beef upon high-priced American farms, with high-priced American labor, than it does in South America.

Why not amend this bill, my Democratic friends? Why have you tied yourselves body and soul to the caucus so that you can not improve this bill when the defects are pointed out.

The people do not want free trade; they want trust control. That was the meaning of the last election. Give it heed, or the people will speak again and you, too, will be deprived of power. You touch the surface, but the profound depths you leave unstirred.

I recognize that it makes little difference how I vote on this measure. You have decreed that it shall pass, and it will pass the House just as it is written, but I speak to register my protest against the injustice of it. [Loud applause.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILSON].

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, in the early days of tariff discussion the contention was made that we needed a protective tariff for the purpose of promoting our infant industries. There may have been some basis for a contention of that kind many years ago, but there is no basis for a contention of that kind now. Our manufacturing establishments are no longer weak, struggling institutions that need the fostering care of a paternal government. We no longer have the argument used that a tariff is necessary for the purpose of protecting infant industries, because our industries have grown until they are the best organized, the largest, and the most productive enterprises found anywhere on earth. And so when an argument is made in favor of a protective tariff now, one of two reasons are assigned for it, either for the purpose of guaranteeing profits to the manufacturer or for protection to American labor. As a matter of fact, the Republican Party's national platform declares for a tariff that will guarantee profits on invested capital, but in no plank in that platform can be found any declaration of any kind proposing to guarantee profitable employment for American labor.

The argument that a high tariff protects American labor may have had some weight with American workingmen in the years gone by, but a long line of bitter experiences has demonstrated to the American worker that it does not necessarily follow that because his employer is able to secure high prices and wring tribute from the American consumer that that same employer will pay him any portion of the tribute he has wrung from the people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

An examination into the industrial conditions surrounding the iron and steel trade of our country will clearly demonstrate the fact that even in that industry, one of the most highly protected on the entire list, workmen are working at common labor and semiskilled labor for 12, 12½ and 13 hours a day at the miserable pittance of 12½ cents per hour—not 12½ cents per hour in a rural community, in a country district, where rents are low and the cost of living comparatively low, but 12½ cents per hour in a densely populated district where rents are high, and where the cost of living is correspondingly high.

About one year ago a strike occurred at the Bethlehem Steel Works, South Bethlehem, Pa. It attracted wide attention at the time. The Commissioner of Labor, Charles P. Neill, authorized an investigation to be made of the wages and working conditions at that plant.

The report of the investigation is found in Senate Document No. 521, Sixty-first Congress, second session.

On page 10 of that report is the following statement:

Of the total employees appearing on the January pay roll, 2,322 worked in occupations regularly requiring 12 hours a day for the 7 days of the week, and 2,233 worked in occupations requiring 12 hours a day for 6 days in the week. Thus 4,725, or 51 per cent of the 9,184 employees on the pay roll, were employed in occupations regularly requiring 12 or more hours per day on their regular working day.

And, again, from page 18, I quote the following:

The January pay roll shows that large numbers of laborers were working for 12½ cents an hour, 12 hours a day, 7 days in the week. Of the 9,184 employed in January, 2,640, or 28.7 per cent, were working for 12 and under 14 cents an hour; 1,528, or 16.6 per cent, for 14 and under 16 cents an hour. Forty-eight and five-tenths per cent of all employees were getting less than 16 cents an hour, 31.9 per cent less than 14 cents, and 61.2 per cent less than 18 cents an hour.

On page 19 of the same report is given a table showing the number of employees and the rates per hour they are paid, which I desire to insert in the RECORD. It is as follows:

Number of employees of the Bethlehem Steel Works earning classified amounts per hour.

Classified earnings per hour.	Employees in each group.

[1] Apprentices.

Under date of April 7, 1910, David Williams and John Loughery, a committee acting for the striking workmen, addressed a letter to President Taft, from which I take the following excerpts:

3. That the rate of compensation paid to the workmen is extremely low, a rate entirely inadequate for decent, respectable workingmen in our country, and entirely too low for the class of work requiring the highest skill. Hundreds of men receiving 12½ cents per hour are compelled to labor regularly 12 hours per day, 7 days per week; while hundreds of men in skilled occupations receive from 14 cents to 22 cents per hour; those receiving in excess of 25 cents per hour are limited to a small number.

6. That the Bethlehem Steel Co. enjoys the benefits of a high protective tariff and is the recipient of valuable Government contracts amounting to millions of dollars annually, from which it obtains enormous profits. In spite of these advantages it exacts a maximum of toil for a wholly inadequate minimum wage and constantly strives to lower the standard of living to the barest point of existence.

But South Bethlehem is not the only place where these conditions exist, They are to be found in every iron and steel manufacturing center in the country.

In the Pittsburg Survey, made under the direction of Paul U. Kellogg, a similar condition was found to exist in the Pittsburg district with the exception that the rates paid for common labor were 16½ cents per hour instead of 12½ cents per hour. On page 176 of the Steel Worker, issued by the Pittsburg Survey, the following statement is found:

To sum up, the weekly schedule in 1907–8 in the Allegheny County plants was as follows:

1. Blast-furnace department: For 60 per cent of the force, 72 hours one week, 96 the next; average week, 84 hours. For 40 per cent, 70 to 84 hours.
2. Bessemer department: Forty-eight hours for a few, 72 hours for the majority.
3. Open-hearth department: Seventy-eight to eighty-four hours.
4. Rolling mills: Seventy-two hours for 95 per cent of the force, 84 to 91 hours for 5 per cent.

The necessity of maintaining intact the industrial organization has accounted in part for the insistence of the companies that Sunday work shall not stop under any circumstances. Workmen told me that it was easier to get excused on any other night than Sunday. In some of the mills men are discharged if they refuse to work on Sunday. During the depression of 1907 and 1908, when the mills were idle a large part of the time, it was still the general custom in the Pittsburg district to begin to roll steel on Sunday evenings, and this was true even when it was known that there were not orders enough to keep the mill running through the week. The Jones & Laughlin plant was notorious in this respect. Mills would be started on Sunday evening when they did not have over 24 hours' work ahead, and would shut down on Monday evening. In November, 1907, the workmen claimed that one of this company's mills was operated to its fullest capacity, working through Saturday night and shutting down for only 12 hours on Sunday, while another mill in the plant that could have done the same kind of work stood idle.

In such a discussion of working hours the question of holidays comes to mind. Twenty-five years ago these were more numerous in the steel industry than they are to-day. Legal holidays were observed, and the custom of shutting down the mills on account of the annual picnic of the Amalgamated Association has already been mentioned. This is all a thing of the past. There are only two holidays in the steel industry to-day, Christmas and the Fourth of July, and even these are denied to the men of the blast-furnace crews. My first glimpse of the works of the Carnegie Steel Co. was on September 1, 1907. I passed through Homestead on my way to Kenneywood Park, where the trades-unionists were holding their celebration of Labor Day. Business houses in Pittsburg were closed and the whole city was on its way to the various parks. But in Homestead there was no cessation in the clamor of the mills. The Edgar Thomson plant in Braddock across the river was enveloped in smoke as we passed. There was a holiday for all except the steel worker.

Miss Margaret F. Byington, investigating for the Pittsburg Survey, makes the following statement on page 138 in the volume of the report entitled "Homestead":

Let us turn from general facts and consider, in the first place, how the economic problem of life can be worked out on $1.65 a day.

With the single men the problem is of course a simple one. Many care little how they live so long as they live cheaply. One of the lodging houses which I visited during the depression consisted of two rooms, one above the other, each measuring perhaps 12 by 20 feet. In the kitchen was the wife of the boarding boss getting dinner—some sort of hot apple cake and a stew of the cheapest cuts of meats. Along one side of the room was an oilcloth-covered table with a plank bench on each side, above it a rack holding a long row of handleless white cups and a shelf with tin knives and forks. Near the up-to-date range, the only piece of real furniture in the room, hung the "buckets" in which all millmen carry their noon or midnight meals. A crowd of men were lounging cheerfully about, talking, smoking, and enjoying life, making the most of the leisure enforced by the shutdown in the mill. In the room above double iron bedsteads were set close together and on them comfortables were neatly laid. In these two rooms, besides the "boarding boss," a stalwart Bulgarian, his wife, and two babies, lived 20 men.

Miss Ida M. Tarbell, commenting on the work of the Pittsburg Survey, says:

There has just been published in Charities and the Commons—now the Survey—one of the most significant pieces of investigations the country has seen. It is the result of a year or more of work on the part of a band of trained investigators commissioned by the charities publication committee: It gives a blue print of Pittsburg; the place itself, the people, and their work. What does this blue print show of the workingmen under protection?

It shows him working 12 hours a day for 7 days in the week, and once in two weeks filling a "long turn," or a 24-hour shift. It is not simply the exceptional man who overworks in this cruel fashion. The 12-hour day is the extreme of an "altogether incredible amount of overwork by everybody," so the Survey declares. Can you make a man by these hours? Is it any wonder that those who lived and walked among those men preparing this Survey report their saying, "Too tired to read; too tired to think; I work and eat and sleep." Any wonder that they report the God-fearing women crying out for the old country, "We might not have been able to live so well there, but oh man, we could have brought up the children in the fear o' God and in a land where men reverence the Sabbath." Any wonder that those men have not the restraining of a family drown fatigue at night in saloons and brothels?

And what do they earn for their toil? In the tariff-protected industries—steel and iron—the greatest number receive a wage, says the report, "so low as to be inadequate to the maintenance of a normal American standard of living. Wages adjusted to the single man in the lodging house, not to the responsible head of a family."

Those low wages, long hours, and miserable conditions are not enforced upon the American workman because he is inefficient. On the contrary, he is the most efficient workman in the world. Nowhere else does he work with the same energy and skill.

James G. Blaine once said:

The actual labor cost of the American product is less because the effectiveness of American labor is superior to that of the workingman of any other nation on earth.

This statement is verified by the following table, compiled by Prof. William G. Clark from official data showing the comparative productivity of American labor with that of other countries for the year 1900:

Average annual output.

American	$2,450
Canadian	1,455
Australian	900
French	640
German	460

If additional verification of the productivity of American labor as compared with other labor is required, I desire to call attention to the fact that 900,000 employees in the coal mines of Great Britain in 1910 produced 296,008,816 tons of coal, or 329 tons per man, while 700,000 employees in the United States in the same year produced 499,273,684 tons, or 713 tons per man.

It follows, then, that while the American workman may receive a higher rate per day than the foreign workman receives, he is paid less in many instances for the production of a given article than is paid the workman of foreign countries for the production of a similar article. Just think of it! Twelve and a half cents per hour paid to an American workman in a highly protected industry, and then try to convince that man that a high protective tariff is for his benefit.

And at the same time that 12½ cents per hour is paid to the workmen performing the actual labor, you find the management being paid at the rate of $100,000 per year, and you find the corporations engaged in the business declaring enormous profits.

The United States Steel Corporation, for instance, since its organization on the 1st of April, 1901, has declared in dividends on its stock $393,000,000. It has expended from its earnings for capital expenditures $217,000,000; it has gathered a surplus, in addition to the surplus it started with, of $139,000,000; it has redeemed of its bonds outstanding $74,000,000; it has bought additional property and made construction investments amounting to $407,000,000; it has paid over $194,000,000 interest on bonds; all told, the net earnings of that corporation during the nine and three-fourths years ending December 31, 1910, have been $1,427,319,647.41.

I submit the following table compiled from the reports of the company, showing its profits from the date of its organization.

Profits of United States Steel Corporation, Apr. 1, 1901, to Dec. 31, 1910.

Dividends on stock		$393,926,886.16
Capital expenditures		217,404,836.05
Surplus	$164,143,157.99
Less	25,000,000.00
Amount of surplus when organized		139,143,157.99
Bonds redeemed		74,722,582.47
Additional property and construction investments		407,169,580.87
Interest on bonds (approximately)		194,952,603.87
Total profits		1,427,319,647.41

These figures show that this vast corporation, by virtue of the high protective-tariff wall under which it is able to conduct its business, has been extorting from the American people not only millions of dollars but billions of dollars and then refusing to pay any portion of it to the wageworkers. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

There are two conditions under which a high tariff results in an increased cost to the consumer. The first is that class of articles which we produce in smaller quantities than we consume, and the second is that class of industries where a few men control the product though the workingman does not secure an increase in wages corresponding with the increased prices to the consumer.

The tariff is placed upon the products of labor, which the workers have to buy and do not sell; but labor itself, which they have to sell and do not buy, is on the free list.

In the past four years the United States Steel Corporation had net profits amounting to $525,358,552, while the wages of its employees, including the salaries of high-priced officials, amounted to $607,955,184, about five-sixths as much profits as the wages amounted to.

The other day the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] quoted from a series of articles written by Mr. Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor, during a recent trip through Europe, in which Mr. Gompers described the hardships endured by European workmen. I believe every statement made by Mr. Gompers in those articles was true. But, what a wonderful construction the gentleman from Illinois puts upon the information which those letters contained. The genius of his logic seems to run in this fashion, "The workers of Europe are downtrodden and oppressed, therefore there is no hunger or privation amongst the workers of America." The gentleman need not have taken a trip to Europe to find all the hardships and horrors of poverty. It could be found right here at his own door. There is not a large city in the country, nor a large industrial center of any kind, that does not contain large numbers of workingmen, working with all the energy they possess, and securing in return scarcely enough to keep body and soul together. Just a day or two before the gentleman made his speech the Civil Service Commission decided to hold an examination in the city of Washington to secure about 250 janitors and charwomen. Shortly after midnight of the day when applications were to be made the first applicants arrived at the building where the application blanks were to be given out. Patiently they, and the others that followed them, stood there during the night waiting for the doors to open, because it might mean an opportunity to get food for themselves and their families if they were successful. Long before the doors were opened a seething, surging mass of 5,000 men and women had gathered there, eager to have the chance of cleaning spittoons for the miserable pittance of $1 per day—and that, too, in the Capital City of tariff-protected America.

In the recent discussions of the reciprocity bill the same parties who are now so eager to protect the American wageworker, because of the profits they can make out of him, denounced the reciprocity pact as being injurious to the American farmer. If the American farmer was placed in the same position as many of our industries are placed, where a few individuals can get together and by a gentleman's agreement determine the amount of production and the price that must be paid by the consumer, it might then be contended, with justice, that a tariff on farm products would enhance the price of them. But no such condition exists, or can exist. The American farmer, like the American wageworker, has competition with the markets of the world. He has to pay enhanced prices for the articles he buys, and yet he is so situated that a tariff on his products does not enhance the price of them. Canada has a tariff on farm products almost equal to our own, and yet the American farmer has produced his crops under American conditions, shipped them into Canada, paying the Canadian duty, and has sold there nearly three times as much farm produce during the past five years as Canada has sold to the United States.

In my judgment, the whole storm of protest which has been raised in the name of the farmer has been for the purpose of inducing him to continue to pay exorbitant prices for manufactured articles under the fear that if he does not do so the value of his crops will be lowered. But the farmers of the country are awake to the situation and will not be deceived by any such specious arguments.

I submit herewith a table showing the exports from the United States to Canada and the imports from Canada to the United States on farm products during the past five years, together with the tariff rates of each country.

But we are told by those who contend for a high tariff in the interest of the American workingman that even if it does not result in higher wages and better conditions of employment, it will result in his securing more work to perform, because industries are built up here in which he can find steadier employment than would prevail if the tariff was on a revenue basis. The fallacy of that argument is made apparent by the figures showing the large number of immigrants coming to this country annually in direct competition with American labor. For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1910, the number of immigrants was 1,041,570. The total number of immigrants during a period of 12 years ending with that date was 9,555,673. This large number of people gravitates almost invariably to our industrial and commercial centers. They are without means when they arrive here to sustain them for any prolonged period of time. They must find work at wages which will bring them quick, even though meager, returns. They become intensely competitive in the labor world with American workmen and with immigrants who have preceded them and those who come after them. With a high tariff wall by which the cost of living is enhanced on the one side and the induced immigration of cheap labor with which he has to compete on the other side, the American workman is placed between the upper and nether millstones which is grinding his standard of living down to the point of bare existence.

I submit the following table, showing the immigrants, by race, for the past 12 years and their distribution by States.

The reciprocity bill has already been passed by this House. The immediate trade benefits resulting from its enactment into law may not be great, but the spirit of friendship which will be fostered and maintained as a result of closer commercial relations will be of far-reaching benefit to the people of both countries.

We now have under consideration H. R. 4413, known as the farmers free-list bill. The enactment of this measure will not only benefit the farmers but the wageworkers as well.

I know the American farmer and I know the American wageworker. My life has been spent amongst them. I have been one of them, and I know that they are not asking any special privilege at the hands of Congress. All they are asking is fair play. Give them equal opportunity with every other man and they will be able to take care of themselves. If they have not done so in the past, it has been entirely due to the fact that special privileges have been given to the few to the disadvantage of the great mass of the people.

I am not contending for free trade. I am not a free trader, but I protest against the American farmer and the American workingman being used as a cat's-paw to pull chestnuts out of the fire in the form of immense profits for the American manufacturer. If the American manufacturer wants to come here to Congress and insist that he has a right to fleece the American people in order that he may become wealthy, let him do so, but let him stand squarely upon that position and not try to hide himself, or his purpose, under the guise of protecting American labor.

The American wageworker has come to thoroughly understand that there is more virtue and more protection to him and his family in a strong, well-equipped labor organization than there is in all the tariff walls that you can build. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Take the trade or calling in which I was raised, a protected industry, one in which the percentage rate is possibly as high as that of any other industry in the State of Pennsylvania, where I come from, where the workers are organized, where they are able to deal with their employers as an organized body, they are paid for mining the coal at the rate of 69 cents per ton, while right in the same field, having the same protection, but where the workmen are unorganized, they are mining the coal for 35.1 cents per ton.

And so it is no wonder that the American workingman feels that his greatest protection is not a high tariff wall that forces up the price of everything he has to buy, but is in his labor organization, where he can secure protection by virtue of concerted action. When you have a high protective tariff the workingman is placed in a position where he has to buy everything he needs for his household in a protected market—in a market where certain lines of goods have been increased in price by virtue of that protective tariff, and then he has to sell the only thing he has for sale—his labor power—in a market that has free trade with all the world except China. And the difference between the price that he is paid for his labor and the price that he has to pay as a consumer for the same article that his labor has produced has gone to make multimillionaires more rapidly in this country during the past 50 years than ever occurred in a like period of the world's history. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. ADAMSON. Will the gentleman suspend just for a moment?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, having spoken early in this debate, I realized that under the rules I was not entitled to recognition the second time until all others desiring to be heard had spoken. Now, as general debate is about to close, I wish to make a few observations by the way of valedictory.

The protectionists advance two arguments on which they rely to justify their system. One is that it builds up and maintains domestic industries, which means excluding competition and controlling the home market by monopoly. The other is that it gives employment and wages to American labor. If both of these ends can be accomplished without robbing the Treasury of the needed revenue which the imported articles would produce, ought not the protectionists to make some concession to the people whom they rob and to the Government which permits the robbery? The trusts object to our reducing rates of duty on anything that they produce and sell at home. They insist on excluding all foreign products from competition, thereby enabling them to rob both the American people with arbitrary high prices and the Treasury of the United States by diverting the revenues which the imported goods would bring in. Now, if the trusts are determined not to permit the American Congress and the Executive to regard the will of the people by reducing the high rates of duty so as thereby both to reduce the cost of living to the common people and supply needed revenue to the Treasury, ought not the trusts, in consideration of the prerogatives and concessions to rob the people, be willing to allow us in some way to provide that they may pay into the Treasury the amount of money which would be raised by the duties on what they produce and sell to their neighbors if those articles were imported and paid revenue to the Government? That would certainly be as little as could be asked of them. True, it would not make reparation or restitution for the billions of graft which they are permitted to levy upon the people, but it would rob the people no more than now. It would serve the two purposes of maintaining the domestic industries and employing American labor, and it would supply the Treasury with revenue so that additional taxes would not have to be laid upon the people in order to support the Government. This proposition may sound like a joke to some folks, but, in my judgment, it will be admitted that it "points a moral and adorns a tale."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Now, Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. ALEXANDER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 4413, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota, by unanimous consent, obtained leave of absence for one day to attend the funeral of a friend.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the cases of George Ihnath and of Sophronia Vanderbeek, Sixty-first Congress, no adverse reports having been made thereon.

THE MONETARY COMMISSION.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 113 (H. Rept. No. 19).

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to transmit to the House of Representatives a detailed statement showing the moneys paid out on account of the Monetary Commission and the dates and purposes of the several payments.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Indiana if it is not customary in resolutions of this kind to insert a clause to this effect, "if not incompatible with the interests of the public service"?

Mr. COX of Indiana. I do not think so, Mr. Speaker, when it relates to some department. Possibly it may when it relates to the President.

Mr. KAHN. Well, Mr. Speaker, there are but few Members present, and I am constrained to object.

PRINTING AND BINDING—COMMITTEE ON EXPENDITURES IN POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 156.

Resolved, That the Committee on Expenditures in the Post Office Department be authorized to have such printing and binding done as may be necessary during the Sixty-second Congress.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to know if a similar resolution has been adopted heretofore.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, I would state to the gentleman that the Committee on Expenditures in the Post Office Department is now conducting hearings and it is desirable that these hearings should be printed. I can assure the gentleman that we shall not abuse the privilege in any way.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Then I shall not object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

COMMITTEE ON EXPENDITURES IN TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following resolution, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 140 (H. Rept. No. 20).

Resolved, That the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department have such printing done as may be necessary for its use during the Sixty-second Congress.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield to the gentleman from South Dakota?

Mr. COX of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, it is not necessary to adopt these resolutions this evening. There are only about 15 or 20 Members present in the House, and while I presume the gentleman can get the authority he seeks later, I think I shall object at this time.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I hope the gentleman from South Dakota will not object. Certain resolutions of larger and other committees were passed similar to this at the present session of Congress. I offered mine at that time, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] temporarily objected. That was a day or two after the House first convened.

I want to say to the gentleman that during the next week this committee will begin hearings. The committee is going to work. A full meeting was had this morning, with the exception of one Member, and it was unanimously decided that it would have sittings and that it was necessary to have certain binding and printing done for the use of the committee. That involves the printing of a considerable number of reports made to the committee by the Secretary of the Treasury, and at present there is only one copy there.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I would like to ask the gentleman from Indiana if this authority has ever been granted to his committee in former Congresses?

Mr. COX of Indiana. I will say to the gentleman that such authority has not been granted to me. I can not speak for my predecessors.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I understand it has not. I understand that the committee of which the gentleman is chairman is holding some hearings?

Mr. COX of Indiana. I will say to the gentleman, no, sir. We had a meeting this morning, and we passed a resolution to begin in the next week to hold hearings.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox] will allow me for a moment, I will say to the gentleman from South Dakota that the various committees on expenditures are going to make investigations in order to be able to report to this House what economies and practices can be introduced to reduce the cost of running the Government. These committees have been part of the organization of this House for many, many years, and it is a very useful and proper field for them to occupy.

Of course they can not proceed with their business without permission to have printing and binding done. No active committee can do that.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I should like to ask the gentleman if this is in the interest of the economy program that we hear so much about?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Undoubtedly. The object of their investigations is to see whether or not they can recommend to the Appropriations Committee of the House a decrease of expenditures. They can not work to advantage without they are given this permission to have printing and binding done, because this facilitates an important part of their duties. Of course, if the gentleman objects, we will have to bring in a resolution at a later date to authorize them to have this done, but I hope the gentleman will not object.

Mr. COX of Indiana. It was on a motion made by a member of my committee, belonging to the gentleman's party—the ranking member of it, I may say—that this resolution was offered. As I said a moment ago, the committee now have in their possession quite a number of reports. The printing will not be expensive, but there is only one copy now in the committee room, and it is with a view to getting this printing done, to distribute among the Members. We desire to have printed these reports made by the Secretary of the Treasury himself.

Mr. FINLEY. If the gentleman will yield to me for a moment I will say that an objection now will delay the matter a day or two, but certainly I will bring in the resolution Monday and it will be privileged.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I should like to ask the gentleman when these hearings will begin.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Not later than Wednesday.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Then there will be no prejudice if this matter goes over until Monday. I do not like to object to the request of the gentleman, and I would not have done so at all had there been a larger number of Members here, or if the minority leader was present, but he is not. It is late Saturday evening, and it is unusual to pass these resolutions at such a time. Now, I may consent to withdraw the objection, but before doing so I should like to ask some gentleman on that side if he can inform us when we are going to get a directory of the Sixty-second Congress?

Mr. FINLEY. My information is that you will get it on Monday.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I am very much more concerned about getting a directory of this Congress than I am about this printing.

Mr. FINLEY. The gentleman knows that the delay has been occasioned by the dilatoriness in the organization of the Senate.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I will say to the gentleman that that has not delayed the issue of the first edition of the directory in previous Congresses.

Mr. FINLEY. It has delayed it in this.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I supposed it was delayed in the interest of economy.

Mr. FINLEY. That is true.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Withholding the usual edition of the directory, which is a source of so much necessary information to the House.

Mr. FINLEY. I think there will be only one edition of the directory in this session.

I will say, in reference to the request of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox], that unless this resolution is passed to-day, the Printing Committee of the House will report it Monday, and it will be privileged.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Oh, Mr. Speaker, that does not influence me in the least in my attitude. I withdraw the objection, but I give notice that I shall object to any further consideration of resolutions this evening.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. THISTLEWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION.

Mr. CRAVENS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolution of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. J. Res. 2. Joint resolution making appropriations for the payment of certain expenses incident to the first session of the Sixty-second Congress.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 27 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday, May 8, 1911, at 12 o'clock noon.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. MANN: A bill (H. R. 8882) to amend section 4 of an act entitled "An act to regulate the sale of viruses, serums, toxins, and analogous products in the District of Columbia, to regulate interstate traffic in said articles, and for other purposes," approved July 1, 1902; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

SENATE.

MONDAY, May 8, 1911.

The Senate met at 2 o'clock p. m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Ulysses G. B. Pierce, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Thursday last was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 2) making appropriations for the payment of certain expenses incident to the first session of the Sixty-second Congress.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTIONS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled joint resolutions, and they were thereupon signed by the Vice President:

H. J. Res. 2. Joint resolution making appropriations for the payment of certain expenses incident to the first session of the Sixty-second Congress;

H. J. Res. 3. Joint resolution making immediately available the appropriations for mileage of Senators and Members of the House of Representatives; and

H. J. Res. 38. Joint resolution to grant authority to the American Red Cross to erect temporary structures in Potomac Park, Washington, D. C.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented a resolution adopted by the National Association for the Study and Prevention of Tuberculosis, favoring an investigation into the subject of the sanitary condition surrounding metal mining underground, with special reference to diseases of the lungs, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Public Health and National Quarantine.

He also presented a petition of the Ministerial Association of Altoona, Pa., praying for the enactment of legislation for the suppression of the opium evil, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. GALLINGER presented a memorial of the National Association of Tanners, remonstrating against placing leather on the free list, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented memorials of Local Union No. 28, International Brotherhood of Paper Makers, of Fort Edward, N. Y.; of Local Union No. 4, International Brotherhood of Paper Makers, of Watertown, N. Y.; of the American Protective Tariff League; of the Congress of the Knights of Labor; of Local Grange of Ossipee; of Local Grange No. 151, of Meriden; of Mount Belknap Grange, of Gilford; and of Local Grange of Barnstead, of the Patrons of Husbandry; and of sundry citizens of Rochester, Colebrook, Durham, Concord, and Contoocook, all in the State of New Hampshire, remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed reciprocal trade agreement between the United States and Canada, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a memorial of the congregation of the Memorial Seventh Day Adventist Church, of Washington, D. C., and a memorial of the congregation of the First Seventh Day Adventist Church, of Washington, D. C., remonstrating against the observance of Sunday as a day of rest in the District of Columbia, which were referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also presented a petition of the congregation of the Presbyterian Church of Bedford, N. H., praying for the ratification of the treaty of arbitration between the United States and Great Britain, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of the congregation of the Garden Memorial Presbyterian Church, of Washington, D. C., praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors on Government ships, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a petition of the Citizens' Association of Anacostia, D. C., praying that the tracks of the East Washington & Suburban Railroad be extended from Anacostia to the District line, which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also (for Mr. FRYE) presented petitions of sundry citizens of Maine, praying for the establishment of a national department of public health, which were referred to the Committee on Public Health and National Quarantine.

He also (for Mr. FRYE) presented a memorial of Northern Light Grange, Patrons of Husbandry, of Monroe, Me., remonstrating against the passage of the so-called cold-storage bill, which was referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

He also (for Mr. FRYE) presented petitions of Burnside Post, No. 47, of Auburn, and of Thomas H. Marshall Post, No. 42, of Belfast, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Maine, praying for the passage of the so-called old-age pension bill, which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also (for Mr. FRYE) presented memorials of the State Grange; Eureka Grange, of Mapleton; Pomona Grange, of Aroostook County; Star Grange, of Hampden; Local Grange of Chelsea; Pomona Grange, of South Paris; Valley Grange, of Guilford; Excelsior Grange, of Farmington; Waldo Pomona Grange, of Mapleton, of the Patrons of Husbandry; and of the Light and Water Co., of Rumford, all in the State of Maine, remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed reciprocal trade agreement between the United States and Canada, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also (for Mr. FRYE) presented a petition of the congregation of the First Parish Meeting House, of Castine, Me., praying for the ratification of the proposed treaty of arbitration between the United States and Great Britain, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. CULLOM. I present a joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Illinois, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senate joint resolution 29.

Whereas in the treaties and conventions now existing between the United States of America and the Government of Russia it is provided that the inhabitants of each country shall mutually have the liberty to enter, sojourn, and reside in the respective territories of each other, and to that effect shall enjoy the same security and protection as natives of the country wherein they reside; and

Whereas the Government of Russia has singled out a certain class of citizens and inhabitants of the United States and forbidden them from sojourning or residing in or entering into the territory or dominion of Russia on account of their religious faith; and

Whereas the severest penalties are visited upon those who in any manner violate this edict of the Russian Government, so that an American citizen of the proscribed faith, with an American passport, who should cross the borders of Russian territory would, under the penal code of Russia, be subjected to the most cruel punishment, without the privilege of trial by jury; and

Whereas it is the fundamental principle of this Government that the rights of its citizens shall not be impaired at home or abroad because of religious belief; that this Government concludes its treaties for the equal protection of all classes of its citizens without regard to religious belief; that the Government of Russia has violated the treaty between the United States of America and Russia, concluded at St. Petersburg December 18, 1832, by construing that part of article 1 thereof, which says that the inhabitants of the respective States "shall be at liberty to sojourn and reside in all parts whatsoever of said territories in order to attend to their affairs, and they shall enjoy to that effect the same security and protection as natives of the country wherein they reside, on condition of their submitting to the laws and ordinances there prevailing, and particularly to the regulations in force concerning commerce," to mean that American citizens of Jewish faith are subject in Russia to the same restrictions that Russia imposes upon Russian inhabitants of Jewish faith, by declining to permit American citizens of Jewish faith to sojourn and reside in Russia in order to attend to their affairs and to enjoy to that effect the same security and protection as non-Jewish native Russians, and by refusing to honor American passports issued to American citizens of Jewish faith; and

Whereas such distinction would be abhorrent to all people who believe in the right of men to worship according to the dictates of conscience: Therefore

Resolved by the senate of the State of Illinois (the house of representatives concurring), That we hereby request our two United States Senators representing the great State of Illinois to request the President of the United States to abrogate the treaty between the Government of Russia and the United States of America, and that a copy of these resolutions be forwarded to our Senators at Washington, urging them to support the resolution now pending in the National House of Representatives for the abrogation of said treaty.

Adopted by the senate April 27, 1911.

JOHN G. OGLESBY,
President of the Senate.
J. H. PADDOCK,
Secretary of the Senate.

Concurred in by the house of representatives April 28, 1911.

CHARLES ADKINS,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
B. H. MCCANN,
Clerk of the House of Representatives.

Filed May 2, 1911.

JAMES A. ROSE,
Secretary of State.

Mr. CULLOM presented memorials of the Chicago Live Stock Exchange and of sundry citizens of Peoria, Ill., remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed reciprocal trade agreement between the United States and Canada, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WETMORE presented petitions of the Ministers' Union of Newport and of sundry citizens of Pawtucket, Warwick, and Providence, all in the State of Rhode Island, praying for the ratification of the proposed treaty of arbitration between the United States and Great Britain, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. GRONNA presented memorials of sundry citizens of Hendrum and of McLean County, in the State of North Dakota, remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed reciprocal trade agreement between the United States and Canada, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BURNHAM presented memorials of S. M. Conery, of Dunbarton; Burton A. Corbett, of Colebrook; H. Baxton, of Somersworth; C. J. Hall, of Durham; of Local Grange No. 151, of Meriden; of Mountain Grange, of Ossipee; and of Mount Belknap Grange, of Gilford, of the Patrons of Husbandry; and of sundry citizens of Rochester, all in the State of New Hampshire, remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed reciprocal trade agreement between the United States and Canada, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BRANDEGEE presented a petition of the Young Men's Christian Association of Connecticut, praying for the ratification of the proposed treaty of arbitration between the United States and Great Britain, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a memorial of Monsignor Slocum Branch, Ancient Order of Hibernians, of Waterbury, Conn., and a memorial of sundry citizens of Bridgeport, Conn., remonstrating against the ratification of the treaty of arbitration between the United States and Great Britain, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. WARREN. I present a letter from J. D. Noblitt, secretary and treasurer of the Cokeville Land & Live Stock Co., of Cokeville, Wyo., remonstrating against any revision of Schedule K of the present tariff law until the investigation now being made by the Tariff Commission is finished. I ask that the letter be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Finance.

There being no objection, the memorial was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COKEVILLE LAND & LIVE STOCK CO.,
Cokeville, Wyo., May 1, 1911.

Hon F. E. WARREN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I do not feel that it is necessary for me to write you that the members of our company are opposed to Congress attempting to revise the wool schedule during the present special session. You know where we stand, just as you know where not only woolgrowers but everybody who believes in tariff protection stand and ought to stand. The growth and improvement of Wyoming and many other wool-producing States depends largely upon the prosperity of the wool and mutton grower. In our State the sheepman is doing a large share toward the reclamation of the country; the best farmers of the country are to be found among the flockmasters. When they make a reasonable profit out of their sheep business it immediately attaches to the enlargement and improvement of their ranches, the creating of local banks, the building of comfortable homes, and such things as go to make the recently Indian-infested portions of the West fit to live and raise families in. Next to the railroads, the sheepmen pay more school tax and create more general school fund by utilizing the State school lands than does the representatives of any other industry in the State of Wyoming. Such a calamity as would follow material reduction of the present wool schedules would seriously affect every industry in all the wool and mutton producing States of the Union, and would simply demoralize practically every industry in the public-range States where the sheep business is the principal industry.

It would be a blunder bordering on silliness for Congress to ignore the fact that a competent committee is now in the field energetically gathering complete data relative to the cost of producing wool and mutton not only in the United States but in all the wool-producing countries of the world, and make a blindfolded effort to revise the schedule before they have the committee's report for their information and guidance. Such unbalanced action would be comparative to the fellow who, while waiting for the doctor, decided to relieve his misery by committing suicide.

Under the present conditions it will be impossible to avoid a gradual decline in the amount of wool production in the public-range States. The range is rapidly falling into the hands of the homeseeker, who, while he may not be able to produce much commodity for sale, will make a living for his family, and can not avoid becoming a customer for mutton and woolen clothing. The remedy, I believe, lies in our being able to induce the farmers of all States to increase their holdings in sheep, and this can not be done by continually tinkering with the tariff or reducing the schedule to a point where the protection afforded will not justify the production of wool in the United States.

I am reliably informed from Missouri that the Hon. CHAMP CLARK and other Congressmen from the "show-me" State are being besieged with petitions praying that no attempt be made to revise the wool schedule until the Tariff Commission has submitted its report.

The depreciation in sheep values caused by the constant agitation about tariff revision affects our land values proportionately, discourages our farmers from farm making, and thus retards crop production and emphasizes the standing inducement for our better farmers to go to Canada or some place else where their products do not help to supply our demands or tend to relieve the higher cost of living.

In protesting against the present Congress attempting to revise the wool schedule I am simply voicing the sentiment of every person I have come in contact with, regardless of politics or party affiliations.

If every banker, farmer, merchant, stockman, lawyer, and doctor of the State of Wyoming and adjoining States should write you on the subject, more than 99 per cent of them would oppose any attempt to revise the wool tariff during the present session of Congress, principally for the simple reason that they will be so much better informed for the task after the Tariff Commission have furnished Congress with the results of the extensive investigation now being made.

With kind regards, I beg to be, yours, very sincerely,

J. D. NOBLITT.

Mr. WARREN. I present a telegram in the nature of a memorial from W. W. Daley, president of the Carbon County Wool Growers' Association, of Wyoming, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Finance.

There being no objection, the memorial was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RAWLINS, WYO., May 3, 1911.

Hon. F. E. WARREN,
Washington, D. C.:

Unalterably opposed to reciprocity free list and reduction of tariff on wool; invite cost of production; condemn ill-advised Democratic Congress forcing legislation detrimental to entire West.

CARBON COUNTY WOOL GROWERS' ASSOCIATION,
W. W. DALEY.

Mr. WARREN presented memorials of David Dickie, of Meeteetse, Wyo.; Frank La Farr, secretary of Local Union No. 28, International Brotherhood of Paper Makers, of Fort Edward, N. Y.; and of J. R. Mansion, secretary and treasurer of the Congress of the Knights of Labor, of Albany, N. Y.; of John Strange, of Washington, D. C.; and of N. J. Bachelder, of Concord, N. H., remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed reciprocal trade agreement between the United States and Canada, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SHIVELY. I present a petition in the form of a preamble and resolution adopted by Friendship Lodge, No. 70, International Association of Machinists, of Fort Wayne, Ind. It is typical of resolutions now coming to the Senate on the question of extradition. It is brief, and I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Judiciary Committee.

There being no objection, the petition was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FRIENDSHIP LODGE, NO. 70,
INTERNATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF MACHINISTS,
Fort Wayne, Ind., May 4, 1911.

Hon. B. F. SHIVELY.

DEAR SIR: The Machinists Union No. 70, at their last regular meeting, May 1, 1911, by unanimous vote, voted to ask the Representatives of our State to support VICTOR L. BERGER'S resolution, which in form reads as follows:

"Whereas the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution ordains that no State shall deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor deny any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws; and

"Whereas it is reported in the public press that one John J. McNamara, heretofore residing in the city of Indianapolis, Ind., has been deprived of liberty without due process of law: Therefore be it

"Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That a committee of each House be appointed to investigate the arrest and extradition of said McNamara, and to report its findings to the two Houses at the earliest practicable moment."

Hoping that when the committee brings in their report you will give this matter your consideration, we remain,

Respectfully, yours,

HENRY KOPF,
J. WERKMAN,
JOHN STANFORD,
Committee.

Mr. OLIVER presented memorials of the Thomas Davis Club, of Philadelphia; Division No. 5, Ancient Order of Hibernians, of Pittsburg; and of sundry citizens of Connellsville, Pittsburg, Braddock, and Wilmerding, all in the State of Pennsylvania, remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed treaty of arbitration between the United States and Great Britain, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland presented a petition of sundry citizens of Baltimore, Md., praying that Italian lemons be placed on the free list, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

PROPOSED PENSION LEGISLATION.

Mr. WORKS. I have here a communication from a veteran of the Civil War on the subject of pension legislation. It contains some important data and valuable suggestions. It is short. I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

There being no objection, the paper was referred to the Committee on Pensions and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE PENSION QUESTION.

To the Congress and to Hon. William H. Taft, President of the United States:

Permit me to follow the example of that gallant soldier, Gen. Daniel E. Sickles, and with great respect, to address to you at this time, a word in behalf of the surviving soldiers of the Civil War.

Fifty years ago many of them responded to the call of Abraham Lincoln, and went forth to do battle in defense of their country, and served faithfully until peace and a restored Union crowned their efforts. Since 1865 many thousands of the survivors of that war have answered the final roll call; those that are yet alive are old men, many of them in straitened circumstances and too feeble to work. If the country is under the great obligation to the old soldier, that is so often expressed in Congress, it must be paid soon if ever.

Neither the Sulloway bill nor the Senate bill as recommended by the Grand Army of the Republic, should have become a law for the payment of pensions, for several reasons—both were unjust and inequitable to pensioners and oppressive to the taxpayers. Both bills provide for the payment of millions of dollars in excess of what is justly due to certain classes of pensioners; both bills are unjust because they place deserters and bounty jumpers on an equality with the men that so often obeyed the orders, "Fix bayonets! Forward, double quick!" Both bills are inequitable because they fail to make any distinction between the men that served only three months and the men that served more than three years.

The framers of the Sulloway bill, when they promised $36 per month to all who might reach the age of 75 years, evidently had in mind the adage, "Live horse 'til the grass grows." It would have sounded more liberal, and involved about the same expense, if they had promised $72 per month to all who reached the age of 100 years. A vast majority of the old soldiers will not live to reach the age of 75 years. The pension that each man is to receive should become fixed and payable at the earliest day possible.

Leaving out of consideration the question of pensions that are paid for gunshot wounds and other personal injuries received in the line of duty, the rates for which apply equally to all, regardless of length of service, and considering only "service" or old-age pensions, it is entirely safe to say that no rate per month can be just that applies equally to all pensioners that served 90 days or more, for the simple reason that the man who served faithfully for three months rendered only one-twelfth part as much valuable service as was rendered by the man who served faithfully for three years. The man who served only three months was subjected to only one-twelfth part of the privations, hardship, and risks which fell to the lot of the man who served three years. It is true that a few regiments of three months' men rendered gallant service at the first battle of Bull Run, at Wilson Creek, and a few other engagements of less importance, but the vast majority of three months' men never heard a shot fired in battle.

Going through a battle or skirmish, without being wounded or captured, is more exciting and risky, but not so exhausting, as the same length of time spent in mud and rain, building corduroy roads. The principal service rendered by short-term men was guard duty at a safe distance in the rear of the fighting men, and about cities, towns, and military posts. They were not expected to and did not perform the hard service rendered by the longer term men.

I can better illustrate the point I have been trying to make plain by citing from the records of two regiments from the same State, the Second Wisconsin Infantry and the Fortieth Wisconsin Infantry:

Term of service, three years. Second Wisconsin Infantry. Wadsworth's Division, First Corps: (1) Col. S. Park Coon, (2) Col. Edgar O'Connor (killed), (3) Col. Lucius Fairchild (brigadier general), (4) Col. John Mansfield.

Losses, killed or died of wounds: Officers, 10; enlisted men, 228; total, 238. Died of disease, accidents, etc.: Enlisted men, 77; total, 77; 1,188 enrolled; 238 killed, 20 per cent.

Battles: Blackburns Ford, Va., killed, 1; First Bull Run, Va., killed, 29; Catlets Station, Va., killed, 1; Gainesville, Va., killed, 81; Manassas, Va., killed, 2; South Mountain, Md., killed, 12; Antietam, Md., killed, 30; Fredericksburg, Va., killed, 3; Gettysburg, Pa., killed, 49; Wilderness, Va., killed, 13; Spottsylvania, Va., killed, 7; Petersburg, Va., killed, 2; Weldon Railroad, Va., killed, 1; Hatchers Run, Va., killed, 1; Gunboat Mound City, killed, 6; total of killed and died of wounds, 238; killed and wounded, 753; missing and captured, 132.

Fortieth Wisconsin Infantry, 100-day men. Regiment organized between May 3 and June 12, 1864; mustered out of service September 16, 1864; total casualties, 1 enlisted man accidentally killed and 1 enlisted man wounded; 1 officer and 16 enlisted men died of disease.

The above is the official record of each regiment.

The service of the Fortieth Wisconsin was simply a pleasant summer outing, with about the usual mortality attending summer picnics by that number of men.

On the record above set forth no reasonable man will say that the survivors of the Fortieth Wisconsin should receive the same service pension that is paid to the survivors of the gallant Second.

In December, 1864, when Gen. Sherman marched "from Atlanta to the sea," took Savannah, and Hood's army was destroyed at Nashville and Gen. Lee's army was cooped in the defenses about Richmond, everybody knew that the end of the war was near, but recruiting went right on, up to the day Lee surrendered. In different sections of the North recruits and substitutes received from $500 to $2,500 for enlisting. Tens of thousands of men were enlisted that never reached their regiments until after the surrender of Lee and Johnston, and then after a few weeks, or months, spent in camp, they were discharged without having had any experience in real war. It is unjust that those belated recruits, that were secured only by high bounties, should receive the same service pension that is paid to the men that served from Sumter to Appomattox. The three-year regiments furnished a very different class of short-term men, when they veteranized in the fall and winter of 1864–5, went home on furlough, received very liberal bounties from their States and counties for reenlistment, returned to the Army in the winter and spring of 1864–5, and were mustered out after the grand review. The fact that many of these veterans served more than 37 months would be offset by the large bounties they received for reenlistment and their short term of service thereafter.

A short-term service was not confined to the regiments that enlisted for short terms of service.

Take the rolls of any of the three-year regiments and note how many resigned or were discharged within the space of a few months after the regiment left its camp of organization, not because of wounds, but on surgeons' certificates of unfitness for military duty. A great many young men who were wholly unfit for military service, enlisted under temporary excitement, and were soon known as "hospital bummers" and "dead beats." Many refused to endure the fatigue and hardship of a few days' march, while many others became homesick and indulged in "soap pills" and other expedients for the purpose of making themselves sick and getting into the hospital, with the hope of obtaining a discharge. Many thousands resigned or deserted without hearing the whistle of a bullet. So great was the number of deserters that President Lincoln issued a proclamation offering to dismiss the charge of desertion in favor of all who returned to their regiments within a given time. Many thousands accepted the President's offer and returned to duty, while a great many thousands did not accept the offer, and it is probable that those who have been granted "honorable" discharges by special act of Congress belonged to the latter class. Men who loyally served their country are dishonored when deserters' names are placed on the pension rolls with theirs. It then ceases to be a roll of honor and becomes a roll of public charity, like that of the slums, where good and bad are served alike. During the war the State authorities, in order to fill their quotas, frequently accepted recruits who, from their habits of life, were unfit for military duty, and many of those recruits, after spending a few weeks or months in hospitals and convalescent camps, had to be discharged, and thus became short-term men.

When the subject of pensions is under discussion the short-term men are, as a rule, loudest in the demand for a pension of "one dollar a day all around," regardless of the service rendered by the pensioner. Such a law would tend to discourage prompt enlistment in future wars.

There is but one fair and equitable plan upon which service or old-age pensions can be paid. The amount paid to each pensioner should depend solely upon the length of time he was in the military service, and a law to that effect should apply to all volunteer officers, noncommissioned officers, and privates that served 90 days or more. There necessarily must be a limit to the amount of money available for the payment of pensions, and hence a limit to the amount received by the most deserving class of pensioners. A law based on the following plan would come as near doing equal and exact justice to all as any law that could be devised: Every man that was regularly mustered into any recognized branch of the military service, and served for a period of 90 days or more, between April 12, 1861, and April 9, 1865, should receive a pension of 10 cents per day for each of his first 90 days' service, and the further sum of 2½ cents per day for each and every day served by him in excess of said first 90 days.

Under such a law the following pensions would be paid: Nine dollars for 90 days' service, a rate of 10 cents per day for each day served; $11.40 for 6 months, or 182 days' service, an average rate of 6¼ cents per day for each day served; $13.57 for 9 months, or 273 days' service, an average rate of 5 cents per day for each day served; $15.88 for 1 year, or 365 days' service, an average rate of 4⅜ cents per day for each day served; $20.42 for 1½ years, or 547 days' service, an average rate of 3⅝ cents per day for each day served; $25 for 2 years, or 730 days' service, an average rate of 3⅜ cents per day for each day served; $29.55 for 2½ years, or 912 days' service, an average rate of 3¼ cents per day for each day served; $35 for 3 years 1 month and 5 days, or 1,133 days' service, an average rate of 3$\frac{1}{10}$ cents per day for each day served.

Under the foregoing plan the ninety-day man would get more than three times as much in proportion to the time he served as the three-year man would get. The six-months' man would get more than twice as much in proportion to the time served as the three-year man would get. Every man who served less than three years would get more in proportion to the time he served than the three-year man would get.

By enacting a law as above proposed, and repealing all existing old-age or service pension laws, general and special, for the payment of service pensions, full justice can be done in granting old-age or service pensions to the surviving soldiers of the Civil War without increasing the amount annually expended by the Bureau of Pensions.

Great injustice is done in granting pensions by "special act of Congress." See the following case on pages 878–9, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 13, 1911:

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Speaker, I move on page 6, line 15, granting a pension to Edwin E. Valder, to strike out "twenty" and insert "thirty."

The Clerk read as follows:

"Page 6, line 15, strike out 'twenty' and insert 'thirty,' so as to read '$30.'"

Mr. SULLOWAY. I do not understand which it is, Mr. Speaker; it appears from the report that this soldier was in the Army a very short time. He enlisted in February, 1865, and came out in September, 1865; and this is the rate allowed to that class of pensioners.

Mr. LATTA. I want to say that this man lives in the same town as I do. He is a very deserving man. While he may not have had as long a service in the Army as many others, I introduced the bill granting him a pension of $30 a month, and I do not ask any more than I think he ought to have, yet the committee are going to cut it down to $20.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. How long did he serve in the Army?

Mr. SULLOWAY. From the 20th of February, 1865, to September, 1865.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. That is a pretty good pension for that length of service, when he was not hurt in the Army.

Mr. SULLOWAY. I hope the gentleman will not press his amendment, because it is in opposition to what the committee does in that kind of a case.

Mr. LATTA. In fact, I would have felt better if the committee had rejected the pension than to put it at $20 a month, because this man deserves more money. He is a poor man——

Mr. SULLOWAY. They all deserve more than they get—more than we can give them.

Mr. LATTA. He is a poor man, and has no income except this $12 a month.

Mr. SULLOWAY. We have nearly doubled that.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. The committee cut down men who served two years and a half to $24.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Very often.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I have one case of that kind myself. I think it is very dangerous to undertake to override the committee.

* * * * * * *

Mr. LATTA. If it is necessary to accept the recommendation of the committee, I withdraw the amendment.

The record fails to disclose in what capacity, if any other than as a voter, the man Valder is employed by Mr. LATTA, but it does disclose the fact that Valder is not entitled to the $12 per month he was then getting. He enlisted just 48 days before "the surrender," when everybody knew it was all over except the shouting. (Valder served just 48 days during the war. He now has a pension of $20 per month, which is 41⅔ cents for each day he served. At the same rate per day the man who served 1 year, or 365 days, would receive a pension of $152.08⅓ per month; the man who served 2 years, or 730 days, would get a pension of $304.16⅔ per month; the man who served 3 years, or 1,095 days, would get $456.25 per month. Comment is unnecessary.) Valder's age is not given, the record does not show that he was too young to enlist before enormous bounties were paid. The writer has a comrade who enlisted at the first call for three-year men. He was shot through both hips at the Battle of Kernstown in 1862 and was discharged, under his protest, as being disabled from further service. As soon as he was able to get along without crutches he again enlisted, and was again dangerously wounded at the Battle of Chancellorsville in almost the same place of his first wound, but refused to take a discharge and served until the final surrender. "Minnie" (he's over 6 feet 3 inches) now gets a pension of $12 per month, and performs hard manual labor almost every day in the year. A law such as is above proposed would prevent such glaring injustice as is presented in this and the Valder case above mentioned.

The bill for the retirement of the volunteer officers of the Civil War contains a full-grown "joker," and for many plain reasons would work great injustices to many other equally or more deserving ex-soldiers. The official records of the War Department show that during the Civil War there were 2,778,309 enlistments in the United States Army, as follows:

At the age of 10 years and under, 25; at the age of 12 years and under, 225; at the age of 14 years and under, 1,523; at the age of 16 years and under, 844,891; at the age of 18 years and under, 1,151,438; at the age of 21 years and under, 2,159,798; at the age of 22 years and over, 618,511.

Adding the number that were 21 and under to the number that were 22 and over we get a grand total of 2,778,309.

In the organization of the volunteer companies and regiments the older men were usually elected and appointed to the commissioned and noncommissioned offices, not because of superior military training or knowledge on their part, but simply because of their superior age. The commissioned officers of a regiment received from 8 to 16 times as much pay per month as the privates got, and were not subjected to many of the hardships that were endured by the private soldiers. The oft repeated statement by officers that while in the Army it took all their pay to defray their necessary expenses, is wholly untrue. The Government sold to commissioned officers supplies of all kinds at actual cost. A full Government ration cost about $9 per month. No man could eat a full Government ration as it was issued in the 60's. It is true that many officers spent all their pay at the sutler's and other places in high living, but they had no monopoly in the practice of getting rid of their money. Nearly all the privates spent all their pay, together with what money they could get from home, in making camp life as joyous as possible. There should be only a reasonable amount of money distributed in pensions, and if the ex-officers, who served a few weeks, and then because of a failure of health or of heart, resigned, receives anywhere from $400 to $1,600 per year, the rate to a great many more meritorious soldiers, who served perhaps 10 times as long, might be too low.

Section 6 of the bill to retire ex-officers, reads, in part, as follows: "That this act is in recognition of sacrifices made and services rendered in the Civil War for the defense of the United States Government and the preservation of the Union."

As above stated, as a rule, the officers were the older men. The 1,151,438 boys that enlisted at the age of 18 years or under, made a much greater sacrifice in behalf of their country than was made by the man who enlisted at the age of 22 years and over. The years donated by those boys to the service of their country they might have spent in acquiring an education or learning a useful trade; the school and apprentice days of the older men were already passed.

The "joker" in the bill to retire ex-officers is in section 1 of the bill, and reads, in part, as follows:

"Provided, That a surviving officer ——— who was honorably discharged from service by muster out, 'resignation,' or otherwise, because of a wound or other bodily injury received or incurred in the line of duty ——— shall, if otherwise eligible ——— receive the full benefits of this act without regard to the length of his said service."

Many brave officers were forced to resign after a few weeks in the service because of wounds received in the line of battle; they are pensioned for wounds. A great many officers that could not be forced into a fight, were, after a few weeks or months, allowed to resign upon receiving a surgeon's certificate of "physical disability," given by order of a superior officer. In such cases every officer and man in the regiment knew that the resignation was caused by cowardice and that it was simply desertion, under color of law. All those "lame ducks," that are now alive, would secure retirement under the clause "or other bodily injuries received or incurred in the line of duty." Impairment of health and "physical disability" are bodily injuries. Who will now have the hardihood to say that the "gallant" old soldier's body was not injured by racking disease more than 45 years ago? No one; and so he will joyously take back the title and emoluments that he so gladly parted with in the early 60's; possibly, without having been six weeks in the Army. Every man that gets a pension should be required to get it on his record on the final muster-out rolls.

The men who gave to the "Nation a new birth of freedom" are rapidly perishing from the earth. The pension roll should be made a "roll of honor" while some of them are yet alive.

REPORTS OF DISTRICT COMMITTEE.

Mr. DILLINGHAM, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill (S. 1095) to authorize the surveyor of the District of Columbia to adopt the system of designating land in the District of Columbia in force in the office of the assessor of said District, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 5) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 1082) to receive arrearages of taxes due to the District of Columbia to July 1, 1908, at 6 per cent interest per annum, in lieu of penalties and costs (Rept. No. 6);

A bill (S. 19) authorizing the Secretary of War to convey the outstanding title of the United States to lots 3 and 4, square 103, in the city of Washington, D. C. (Rept. No. 7);

A bill (S. 29) to amend paragraph 43 of an act entitled "An act making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for other purposes," approved July 1, 1902 (Rept. No. 8); and

A bill (S. 20) directing the Secretary of War to convey the outstanding legal title of the United States to sublots Nos. 31, 32, and 33 of original lot No. 3, square No. 80, in the city of Washington, D. C. (Rept. No. 9).

Mr. GALLINGER, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill (S. 1087) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the better registration of births in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved March 1, 1907, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 10) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 30) to provide for the extension of Kenyon Street to Mount Pleasant Street, and for the extension of Seventeenth Street from Kenyon Street to Irving Street, in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes (Rept. No. 11);

A bill (S. 1094) for the widening of Sixteenth Street NW. at Piney Branch, and for other purposes (Rept. No. 12);

A bill (S. 306) to confirm the name of Commodore Barney Circle for the circle located at the eastern end of Pennsylvania Avenue SE., in the District of Columbia (Rept. No. 13);

A bill (S. 32) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the extension of Newton Place NW. from New Hampshire Avenue to Georgia Avenue, and to connect Newton Place in Gass's subdivision with Newton Place in Whitney Close subdivision," approved February 21, 1910 (Rept. No. 14);

A bill (S. 21) for the relief of Ida A. Chew, owner of lot 112, square 721, Washington, D. C., with regard to assessment and payment of damages on account of changes of grade due to construction of the Union Station, District of Columbia (Rept. No. 15); and

A bill (S. 23) to authorize the extension of Underwood Street NW. (Rept. No. 16).

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (S. 31) to authorize the extension of Park Place NW., submitted an adverse report (No. 18) thereon, which was agreed to, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. JONES, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill (S. 1090) providing for guides in the District of Columbia and defining their duties, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 19) thereon.

NATHAN STRAUS PASTEURIZED MILK LABORATORY.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am directed by the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill (S. 26) to authorize the acceptance by the United States of the gift of the Nathan Straus Pasteurized Milk Laboratory, to report it favorably without amendment, and I submit a report (No. 17) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill. I will say that a bill precisely similar passed the Senate at the third session of the Sixty-first Congress, and it is somewhat important that this bill should be acted upon promptly.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to accept from Nathan Straus, in behalf of the United States, the Nathan Straus Pasteurized Milk Laboratory, established by said Nathan Straus in May, 1910, and since said date operated at his expense at 1319 H Street NW., Washington, D. C., including the unexpired portion of the lease of the said premises for which the said Nathan Straus is bound, and to conduct and operate said laboratory work as a part of the Public Health and Marine-

Hospital Service; and the sum of $15,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be immediately available and to continue available until and including June 30, 1912, for the maintenance of said laboratory, including the purchase of milk and other necessary materials, employment of personal services, rent, hire or purchase and maintenance of transportation, supplies, and all other necessary incidental and contingent expenses, to be expended with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, under the supervision and control of the Surgeon General of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service, for the purpose of investigating the practical utility of infants' milk depots in the reduction of infant mortality, the relative value of pasteurized and raw milk for infant feeding, and for other appropriate scientific purposes; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to exercise such control and supervision over the laboratory and the distribution of its products as will, in his judgment, best carry out the purposes of this act; and he may, in his discretion, give or sell the said products, at prices to be fixed by him, to such responsible individuals, associations, institutions, or others, as will distribute or use them under such conditions and regulations as the Surgeon General of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may make; and any sum realized from the sale of said products shall be applied to the maintenance and other expenses of the said laboratory, in addition to the appropriation therefor herein made.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I desire to know how this proposition now comes before the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire has just reported it from the Committee on the District of Columbia, and asks unanimous consent for its present consideration.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, if the proponents of this measure will amend it so as merely to authorize the experiment, I should offer no objection to the Government conducting that kind of an experiment, or at least I should make no further objection than to vote against it; but I am not willing to see the United States establish a milk dispensary, if I can prevent it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I think if the Senator will carefully read the bill he will see that it practically does exactly what he suggests.

Mr. BAILEY. I observe that it authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to fix the price at which milk may be sold, or he may give it away. I am not willing for the United States to become a merchant in milk any more than a merchant in other wares, and I hope the Senator will reconstruct the bill limiting it merely to experimental purposes. I myself, on principle, would about as soon see the Government of the United States establish a coal yard here to supply people with fuel as to conduct the proposed laboratory. The only difference is that in this case, I believe, the intention is to supply children principally, but grown children will soon be patronizing this public station.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, that could hardly happen. The appropriation is very small, and it is limited——

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I object to the present consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection being made, the bill goes to the Calendar.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is all right. Then I will suggest——

Mr. BAILEY. I will say to the Senator that if he will reconstruct the bill so as to provide that this laboratory shall merely be an experiment I shall make no protest.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I regret that the Senator did not permit me to conclude my sentence before he objected.

Mr. BAILEY. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will simply give notice that at a very early day I shall move to take up the bill for consideration.

Mr. BAILEY. If the Senator chooses to try it that way instead of the other, very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill goes to the Calendar.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. JONES:

A bill (S. 2046) to better regulate the traffic in intoxicating liquors in the District of Columbia; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. GALLINGER. On the 6th day of April I introduced a bill (S. 24) for the creation of the police and firemen's relief fund, and so forth, which I desire to withdraw from the files. I introduce the following bill on the same subject. It is somewhat changed. I ask that it be read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The bill (S. 2047) for the creation of the police and firemen's relief and retirement fund, to provide for the relief and retirement of members of the police and fire departments, to establish a method of procedure for such relief and retirement, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. GALLINGER:

A bill (S. 2059) for the relief of Joseph P. Davis (with accompanying paper);

A bill (S. 2060) to remove the charge of desertion from the record of Patrick Fay;

A bill (S. 2061) to increase the efficiency of the Pay Department, United States Army (with accompanying paper); and

A bill (S. 2062) for the purchase of land in the vicinity of Fort Baldwin, Me.; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. 2063) for the relief of J. O. Johnson (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 2064) for the relief of John W. Whalen; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

A bill (S. 2065) granting a pension to Thaddeus Little;

A bill (S. 2066) granting an increase of pension to James M. Lowell;

A bill (S. 2067) granting a pension to Charles M. Newbegin;

A bill (S. 2068) granting an increase of pension to William M. Plummer;

A bill (S. 2069) granting an increase of pension to William L. Pratt;

A bill (S. 2070) granting an increase of pension to Delia Rich;

A bill (S. 2071) granting an increase of pension to Lizzie U. Ricker;

A bill (S. 2072) granting an increase of pension to William K. Ridgate;

A bill (S. 2073) granting an increase of pension to George M. Roak;

A bill (S. 2074) granting a pension to Thomas Roy;

A bill (S. 2075) granting an increase of pension to John Ryan;

A bill (S. 2076) granting an increase of pension to Thatcher Vose;

A bill (S. 2077) granting an increase of pension to Sumner R. Tarbox;

A bill (S. 2078) granting an increase of pension to Elbridge P. Wardwell;

A bill (S. 2079) granting an increase of pension to Charles N. Ware;

A bill (S. 2080) granting an increase of pension to Joseph A. Libby;

A bill (S. 2081) granting a pension to George Johnson;

A bill (S. 2082) granting an increase of pension to John M. Jackson;

MANUFACTURE OF PATENTED ARTICLES.

By Mr. GORE:

A bill (S. 2116) to provide for compulsory license for the manufacturing of patented articles, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. GORE. I ask unanimous consent to submit at this time a concurrent resolution on the same subject, and that it be also referred to the Committee on Patents.

The concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 1) authorizing a special committee of the Senate and House Committees on Patents to investigate the methods of selling, leasing, and controlling patented articles or inventions was read and referred to the Committee on Patents, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That a joint committee of both Houses of Congress is hereby created, to be composed of the chairmen of the Committees on Patents of the two Houses and two other members of each of said committees, to be designated by the respective chairmen thereof. The joint committee so appointed shall have the power to designate one of its members as chairman thereof. Any vacancy occurring on the committee shall be filled in the same manner as the original appointment. And said committee so constituted is empowered and directed to examine and compare the patent laws of this and other countries, with special reference to the compulsory working of patents and the issuance of compulsory license for the manufacture of patented articles; to ascertain the methods of sale, leasing, disposing, and control of patented articles in the United States; to ascertain whether patents are used or misused in the establishing of industrial trusts or monopolies; and to investigate all other matters material or pertinent to the purposes of this resolution, and to report their findings to Congress, with recommendations as to any needful legislation to protect the public interest and to promote the general welfare.

Second. Said committee shall have the power to employ such assistance as may be necessary, to take testimony under oath, to subpœna witnesses and compel their attendance, to compel the production of books and papers, to administer oaths, to keep a record of its proceedings and cause the same to be printed, and to do all other acts and things necessary to carry into effect the provisions of this resolution.

Third. Subpœnas may be signed by the chairman or any member of said committee, and the assistance of any Federal court in whose jurisdiction the committee shall hold its sessions may be invoked to compel the attendance of any witness refusing to obey the subpœna or order of said committee, and no witness shall be liable for prosecution for any act concerning which he may testify, excepting for perjury before said committee.

Fourth. That expenses incurred by the committee herein provided for shall be paid equally out of the contingent funds of the Senate and House of Representatives.

SOLDIERS' HOME IN FLORIDA.

Mr. BRYAN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 1380) to authorize the location of a Branch Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, Sailors, and Marines in the State of Florida, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

CONTRIBUTIONS FOR CAMPAIGN PURPOSES.

Mr. WORKS submitted amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 2958) to amend an act entitled "An act providing for publicity of contributions made for the purpose of influencing elections at which Representatives in Congress are elected," which were read and referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections and ordered to be printed, as follows:

1. Amend by adding after the word "States," in line 12 of page 1 of said act, the following:

"and also a like time before any primary election held for the nomination of candidates to be voted for at such election."

2. Amend by adding after the word "within," in line 11 of page 2 thereof, the following:

"twenty days after any such primary election and."

3. Amend by adding, after line 2 of page 4 thereof, the following:

"And each candidate voted for at such primary or final election shall append to such statement his affidavit showing what amounts of money have been contributed by others to his campaign or election expenses and the amounts paid out by him or any other person or persons in his behalf for the expenses of or in aid of his campaign or election, and for what purposes said expenditures were made, giving the items and amounts thereof."

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. GALLINGER (for Mr. FRYE) it was—

Ordered, That papers accompanying Senate bill 4486, Fifty-ninth Congress, first session, granting a pension to Hiram K. Choate, may be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, no adverse report thereon having been made.

Ordered, That the original discharge papers accompanying Senate bill No. 3267, Sixty-first Congress, second session, granting a pension to Mary E. Sloan, may be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, no adverse report on said bill having been made.

PROPOSED LIMITATION OF DEBATE.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, pursuant to the notice I gave on April 4, I offer the resolution which I send to the desk and ask that it be referred to the Committee on Rules. It is a resolution to amend the rules of the Senate.

The resolution (S. Res. 34) was read and referred to the Committee on Rules, as follows:

Resolved, That Rule XIX of the standing rules for conducting business in the Senate of the United States be amended by adding the following proviso at the end of the first paragraph of said rule, to wit:

"Provided, That after any question has been considered upon five separate calendar days, or when any question has been debated for 10 consecutive hours, it shall be in order for any Senator to rise to a question of privilege and move to close all debate and vote at a fixed time upon the pending question before the Senate after 3 hours' additional consideration. Said motion shall be submitted to the Senate and shall be determined by a yea-and-nay vote. If two-thirds of the Senators present vote in favor of the motion, it shall be declared carried, debate shall close, and a vote taken upon the question as provided in the motion. If less than two-thirds vote for the motion, the same shall be declared lost."

INDEPENDENT REPUBLICS OF WESTERN HEMISPHERE.

Mr. RAYNER. I submit the following resolution, and ask that it be read and lie on the table.

The resolution (S. Res. 35) was read and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

Resolved, That the following declaration of principles be, and the same is hereby, adopted in order clearly to define the attitude of the United States toward the independent Republics of the Western Hemisphere, so that in our international relations with these Governments it may be fully understood that the United States do not intend to depart from the policy heretofore uniformly pursued toward them:

First. That in the opinion and judgment of the Senate the United States have no right or purpose to interfere with or disturb the political integrity of any of the independent Republics of the Western Hemisphere, or to assume at any time any political protectorate over them.

Second. While we reaffirm the doctrine known as the Monroe doctrine and announce our adherence thereto, as interpreted and settled by precedent and authority, that the United States hereby offer to these Governments an assurance and guaranty that their territory shall not be usurped by the United States, and that the United States shall in no manner interfere with or assume any control over the administration of their political institutions.

MARY E. PULSIFER.

Mr. GALLINGER (for Mr. FRYE) submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 36), which was read, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay from the contingent fund of the Senate to Mary E. Pulsifer, widow of Pitman Pulsifer, late compiler of the Navy Yearbook and indexer for Senate Public Documents, a sum equal to one year's salary at the rate he was receiving at the time of his demise, said sum to be considered as including funeral expenses and all other allowances.

HEARINGS BEFORE THE COMMITTEE ON COMMERCE.

Mr. GALLINGER (for Mr. FRYE) submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 37), which was read and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce, or any subcommittee thereof, be, and the same is hereby, authorized to employ a stenographer from time to time, as may be necessary, to report such hearings as may be had on bills or other matters pending before said committee, and to have printed such hearings and such other papers as may be deemed necessary in connection with subjects heretofore considered or to be considered by said committee during the Sixty-second Congress.

COST OF LIVING IN AMERICAN TOWNS.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask unanimous consent that the document being the report of the inquiry by the Board of Trade of London into working classes, rents, housing, and retail prices, together with the rates of wages in certain occupations in principal industrial towns of the United States of America, with an introductory memorandum and comparison of conditions in the United States and the United Kingdom, be printed as a public document. (S. Doc. No. 22.)

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the order is entered.

CONSIDERATION OF THE CALENDAR.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Morning business is closed. The calendar under Rule VIII is in order. The Secretary will state the first business on the calendar.

The first business on the calendar was the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 14) for appointment of a member of the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BROWN] has entered a motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was read the third time and passed.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I do not see the Senator from Nebraska here at this moment. I therefore ask that the joint resolution be laid aside without prejudice until he comes in.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be passed over without prejudice.

ELECTION OF SENATORS BY DIRECT VOTE.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 39) proposing an amendment to the Constitution providing that Senators shall be elected by the people of the several States was announced as next in order.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I know, from the suggestions of Senators made privately, that there are those who are not prepared to proceed to a discussion of the measure at this time, but who desire to discuss it later. I have no desire, of course, to urge it, if I could, to such a conclusion as to prevent the discussion going on at the convenience of Senators, but I desire at this time to ask unanimous consent that the joint resolution be taken up and made the unfinished business. I will say that after that request is granted, if it shall be, I will ask to have the joint resolution laid aside for the convenience of certain Senators who desire to discuss the subject.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I should like to inquire under what rule we can make anything unfinished business before 2 o'clock, or the equivalent hour of 4 o'clock to-day?

Mr. BORAH. I understood the Chair to suggest the other day that it could only be done by unanimous consent, and I have sufficient confidence in the parliamentary knowledge of the Chair to proceed with safety in that respect.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, while it is said that anything can be done in the Senate by unanimous consent, we have rules, with reference to the order of business, which I am inclined to think are without the rule of unanimous consent. We have a standing rule which provides that only matters taken up after 2 o'clock can be made unfinished business or become unfinished business automatically. I assume that the hour of 2 o'clock, under the former manner of procedure, when we met at 12 o'clock, now becomes 4 o'clock; in other words, the morning hour lasts for two hours as applied to this class of procedure. Of course, it is easy enough to object to anything that may be taken up by unanimous consent, and thus send it over; yet——

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. I venture to say that until the rules are amended the calendar hour has been eliminated, and that the real fact is that the motion to proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution is in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is not the motion, however. The request is for unanimous consent that the joint resolution be made the unfinished business.

Mr. BAILEY. I understand that; but I was meaning to say that, independently of the request, such a motion would be in order. If the Senator from Idaho will look at the very first sentence of Rule VIII, he will see that it reads:

At the conclusion of the morning business for each day, unless upon motion the Senate shall at any time otherwise order, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the calendar of bills and joint resolutions, and continue such consideration until 2 o'clock.

Now, undoubtedly it is more than 2 o'clock, and the consideration of the calendar is not in order. I perfectly understood that, and I have on the President's table amendments to the rules which would have conformed them to the change that has been made in the hour of meeting.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That has already been covered by a resolution passed many years ago, introduced, as the Chair now remembers, by Senator Hoar, that where the hour of meeting is changed from noon the morning hour is concluded at the end of two hours. The unfinished business then becomes the order, no matter what the hour may be by the clock.

Mr. BAILEY. And that resolution of Senator Hoar is printed in the Manual.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is right.

Mr. BAILEY. But I have not understood that it was a part of the standing rules of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That has been the practice of the Senate since the present occupant of the chair has been here.

Mr. BAILEY. If the present practice of the Senate has been to regard it as a part of the rules, then I am in error, and I withdraw the suggestion.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then it is not in order until the expiration of two hours after the time fixed for the meeting of the Senate to make anything the unfinished business or to take up the unfinished business. But had this become the unfinished business by reason of its having been taken up under the rule and laid over, it would not be due for consideration until the expiration of the morning hour, not fixed by the clock, but the two hours. So it is not in order now to deal with any matter with a view of making it the unfinished business.

Then I suggest again, as I did on a former occasion, this can not, without a complete violation of our rules, be taken up under a motion that it shall be the unfinished business. If it is ever the unfinished business, it must become so automatically, by reason of having been taken up after 2 o'clock or the equivalent of 2 o'clock; in other words, after the morning hour.

I think any attempt to violate the rules and set them aside in this offhand way ought not to be countenanced. Of course I can prevent it by an objection, but I want to see the practice settled, so that we will not be placed in the position of objecting, and I do not think it is in order to take up the calendar under Rule VIII until after 2 o'clock. We proceed by unanimous consent until that time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Oh, yes; clearly, as soon as the morning hour is closed and it is so announced by the Chair, it is then in order. There can be no possible question about that. The rule expressly says so.

Mr. GALLINGER. While I would not debate the matter with the Senator from Idaho, because I think he is right, that we can not make a matter the unfinished business except by unanimous consent until after 2 o'clock, I should like the Clerk to read clause 3 of Rule VII, which has some application to the matter of moving to proceed to the consideration of bills. We are not compelled to wait until 2 o'clock before we can make a motion to take up a bill.

Mr. HEYBURN. I agree with that, but a measure does not become the unfinished business because it is taken up before the time.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is true.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The opinion of the Chair is that the granting of unanimous consent amounts to a suspension of all rules and that the Senate can practically do anything by unanimous consent, upon the theory that it thereby suspends the rules. Of course, a matter taken up after 2 o'clock becomes automatically the unfinished business, but the Chair thinks there are other modes in which it can be so made.

Mr. GALLINGER. It will be observed, if the Chair will permit me, that in the matter which I desired to have read that very question is included:

Until the morning business shall have been concluded, and so announced from the Chair, or until the hour of 1 o'clock has arrived, no motion to proceed to the consideration of any bill, resolution, report of a committee, or other subject upon the calendar shall be entertained by the Presiding Officer unless by unanimous consent.

I think that rule is of universal application in this body; that by unanimous consent it can be done.

Mr. HEYBURN. I thoroughly concur in that conclusion, and if a Senator moves now to take up this measure one objection sends it over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. No; the joint resolution is up now. One objection sends it over after it is up. It has been reached in the call of the calendar. It is now up.

Mr. HEYBURN. I intended so to express myself. I may have been unfortunate in framing my language.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair begs pardon of the Senator.

Mr. HEYBURN. The calendar is in order now, because the Chair has declared that morning business is concluded; but I merely desire to suggest that the Senate can not now by unanimous consent make the joint resolution the unfinished business. It becomes the unfinished business, if at all, automatically, by reason of the position it occupies in the order of business.

Mr. BORAH. I desire to ask unanimous consent that the joint resolution be taken up and made the unfinished business.

Mr. HEYBURN. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

Mr. BORAH. I move that the Senate take a recess until 4 o'clock this afternoon.

Mr. BACON. I understand the object of the Senator from Idaho, in making the motion, is that after the Senate reassembles he may move to take up this joint resolution; and I would suggest to him, in view of the fact that the hour of reassembling proposed is an hour and a quarter from now and many Senators will doubtless be absent, that he couple with it a request for consent that no business shall then be transacted other than to act upon that motion, except a motion for an executive session. Of course I do not mean to exclude such a motion.

Mr. BAILEY. We might have to vote on the motion to proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution, and we would want a quorum here.

Mr. BACON. Yes; of course.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion the Senator from Idaho made is not debatable. The question is on agreeing to the motion made by the Senator from Idaho that the Senate take a recess until 4 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 2 o'clock and 47 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until 4 o'clock p. m.

AFTER THE RECESS.

At the expiration of the recess (at 4 o'clock p. m.) the Senate reassembled.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bacon	Curtis	Kern	Rayner
Bailey	Davis	La Follette	Reed
Borah	Dillingham	Lippitt	Shively
Bradley	Dixon	McCumber	Simmons
Brandegee	du Pont	Martin, Va.	Smith, Md.
Briggs	Fletcher	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Mich.
Bristow	Foster	Myers	Smoot
Brown	Gallinger	Nelson	Stone
Bryan	Gamble	Nixon	Sutherland
Burnham	Gore	Oliver	Taylor
Burton	Gronna	Overman	Thornton
Chamberlain	Guggenheim	Owen	Townsend
Chilton	Heyburn	Page	Warren
Clapp	Hitchcock	Paynter	Watson
Clark, Wyo.	Johnson, Me.	Penrose	Wetmore
Crane	Johnston, Ala.	Perkins	Williams
Culberson	Jones	Poindexter	Works
Cullom	Kenyon	Pomerene

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy-one Senators have answered to the roll call. A quorum of the Senate is present.

ELECTION OF SENATORS BY DIRECT VOTE.

Mr. BORAH. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 39) proposing an amendment to the Constitution providing that Senators shall be elected by the people of the several States.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. HEYBURN. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BACON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE]. I transfer the pair to my colleague [Mr. TERRELL] and vote "yea."

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama (when Mr. BANKHEAD'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. BANKHEAD] is absent and is paired with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. DILLINGHAM (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], and I vote "yea."

Mr. McCUMBER (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. PERCY], but I understand he would vote the same way that I would upon this occasion, and therefore I shall vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. GALLINGER (when Mr. ROOT'S name was called). I was requested to announce that the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] is paired with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON].

Mr. GALLINGER (when Mr. STEPHENSON'S name was called). I was requested to announce that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON] is paired with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD].

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I was requested to announce that my colleague [Mr. McLEAN] is paired for the day with the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA].

Mr. GAMBLE. My colleague [Mr. CRAWFORD] is ill, and for that reason is not in the Chamber at this time. If he were here, I know he would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 66, nays 5, as follows:

YEAS—66.

Bacon	Davis	Lippitt	Shively
Bailey	Dillingham	McCumber	Simmons
Borah	Dixon	Martin, Va.	Smith, Md.
Bradley	du Pont	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Mich.

NOT VOTING—20.

Bankhead	Frye	Newlands	Smith, S. C.
Bourne	Lea	O'Gorman	Stephenson
Clarke, Ark.	Lodge	Percy	Swanson
Crawford	Lorimer	Richardson	Terrell
Cummins	McLean	Root	Tillman

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

Mr. BORAH. I understand there is a desire to move an adjournment at this time, perhaps until Thursday, owing to the fact that important hearings are being held before some committees, and I shall give way for that motion, if it is the desire to make it.

Mr. CULLOM. I do not think it is the purpose that the Senate shall adjourn over until Thursday.

Mr. BORAH. Very well; I was in error to that extent.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator from Illinois withhold the motion until I can make a request?

Mr. CULLOM. Certainly.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Illinois withholds the motion.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. BAILEY. I introduced several amendments to the rules a few days ago and asked that they lie upon the President's table. I now ask that those amendments be referred to the Committee on Rules.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that reference will be made.

REPORT OF ROBERT J. WALKER.

Mr. GORE. I should like to ask unanimous consent that the annual report of Robert J. Walker, Secretary of the Treasury, filed, I believe, February 11, 1848, be printed as a public document as soon as it can possibly be done.

Mr. STONE. I will say to the Senator from Oklahoma that that report is or will be included in the publication which the Committee on Finance has been directed to make.

Mr. GORE. That is very satisfactory.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oklahoma then withdraws his request?

Mr. BAILEY. I suggest to both Senators that at the request of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] the document has already been printed as a Senate document. There are some eliminations, but I take it that it contains all that Senators will desire.

Mr. GORE. I withdraw the request.

Mr. BAILEY. It is in the shape of a letter which accompanied the Secretary's report on the finances, and it has already been printed as a document.

APPORTIONMENT AND PUBLICITY BILLS.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I simply wish before the Senate adjourns to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on the Census as to the probability of a report on the apportionment bill which passed the House and is now before the Committee on the Census of the Senate.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am not able to say, Mr. President, in response to the inquiry of the Senator from Virginia, when the bill will be reported out. I expect to have a meeting of the Committee on the Census at a reasonably early day, and give the bill the consideration its importance entitles it to in that committee. It is a very important measure and it should be carefully considered.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. My object in making the inquiry was simply to call attention and to emphasize as far as I could the fact that we have no calendar. There is very little business that can now be taken up until the committees make some report, and my object was simply to express the hope that the matters which are before the committees will be presented to the Senate as soon as practicable.

While I am on the floor I will also inquire as to the bill in relation to the publicity of campaign contributions, another House bill, which has been referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. I should like to know from the chairman of that committee if there is any likelihood that we will soon have a report in respect to that bill.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President, the bill has not been considered by the committee as yet, but it will be considered very soon. For that purpose a special meeting of the committee has been called.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I fully understand that the bill has not been considered in committee, but my object was to urge the importance of the consideration of these measures. A little later on we will have tariff matters under consideration in the Senate, and their importance will, of course, require the subordination of other measures. I feel that as the Senate has now been in session for more than a month it is time that we should begin to do some of the work of the session.

I hope very much that these bills, which have not been considered in committee, will be considered, so that we will have a calendar which the Senate may take up, instead of adjourning, as we are now doing, from Monday until Thursday and from Thursday until Monday, without doing anything.

Mr. CULLOM. I insist on my motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Illinois moves that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 17 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, May 9, 1911, at 2 o'clock p. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, May 8, 1911.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., as follows:

Our Father in heaven, we approach Thee with renewed faith and confidence in the things which make for righteousness in the soul. Inspire us, we beseech Thee, with broad and comprehensive views of life, quicken our conscience to do Thy will, that at the close of this day we may ask Thy blessing upon all our acts and lie down to peaceful slumber in the full consciousness of duty well done. For Thine is the kingdom and the power and the glory forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, May 6, 1911, was read and approved.

PRINTING AND BINDING, COMMITTEE ON REFORM IN CIVIL SERVICE.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, I present the following privileged report (H. Rept. 21) from the Committee on Printing on House resolution 155, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Printing, having had under consideration the House resolution (H. Res. 155) authorizing the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service to have necessary printing and binding done, reports the same back to the House, with the recommendation that the resolution be agreed to.

The said resolution is as follows:

"Resolved, etc., That the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service be authorized to have such printing and binding done as shall be necessary in the transaction of its business during the Sixty-second Congress."

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, the resolution speaks for itself, and I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

PRINTING, COMMITTEE ON EXPENDITURES IN TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, I present also the following privileged report (H. Rept. 20) from the Committee on Printing on House resolution 140, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Printing, having had under consideration the House resolution (H. Res. 140) authorizing the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department to have necessary printing done, reports the same back to the House with the recommendation that the resolution be agreed to.

The said resolution is as follows:

"Resolved, etc., That the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department have such printing done as may be necessary for its use during the Sixty-second Congress."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

PRINTING AND BINDING, COMMITTEE ON EXPENDITURES IN POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, I also present the following privileged report (H. Rept. 18) from the Committee on Printing on House resolution 72, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Printing, having had under consideration the House resolution (H. Res. 72) authorizing the Committee on Expenditures in the Post Office Department to have printing and binding done, reports the same back to the House with the recommendation that the resolution be agreed to.

The said resolution is as follows:

"Resolved, etc., That the Committee on Expenditures in the Post Office Department be authorized to have such printing and binding done as shall be necessary for the transaction of its business during the Sixty-second Congress."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

EXPENSES OF MONETARY COMMISSION.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I present the following privileged report (H. Rept. 19) from the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department on House resolution 113, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department, to whom was referred House resolution No. 113, calling for information as to the amount of money expended by the Monetary Commission, having considered the same, reports thereon with the recommendation that it do pass.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 113.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to transmit to the House of Representatives a detailed statement showing the moneys paid out on account of the Monetary Commission and the dates and purposes of the several payments.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

THE TARIFF.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 4413, to place agricultural implements and other articles on the free list.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 4413, the free-list bill, with Mr. ALEXANDER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 4413. The Clerk will report the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill to place on the free list agricultural implements, cotton bagging, cotton ties, leather, boots and shoes, fence wire, meats, cereals, flour, bread, timber, lumber, sewing machines, salt, and other articles.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, general debate having closed, I ask the Clerk to read the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. General debate having concluded, the Clerk will read the bill by sections.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That on and after the day following the passage of this act the following articles shall be exempt from duty when imported into the United States.

Mr. HAMILL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

[Mr. HAMILL addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 1, line 5, by inserting after the word "States" the following:

"From a country, dependency, province, or colony, being the product thereof, which imposes no tax or duty on like articles imported from the United States."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment that it is not germane to the bill under consideration. The amendment, as I understand it, seeks to change this bill so as, under certain conditions, to place a tax on the articles enumerated in the bill. I will not detain the Chair with a lengthy argument on the subject, but I will call the Chair's attention to a decision of Mr. SHERMAN, who was acting as Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union when the Dingley bill was under consideration. At that time Mr. Dockery, of Missouri, offered an amendment to the first section of the Dingley bill, which was the taxing section of that bill, which reads as follows:

Provided, That when it is shown to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Treasury that such articles are manufactured, controlled, or produced in the United States by a trust or trusts, the importation of such articles from foreign countries shall be free of duty until such manufacture, control, or production shall have ceased, in the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. Nelson Dingley, of Maine, made a point of order against the amendment, saying:

An amendment placing on the free list, under certain conditions, articles that are now on the dutiable list is not germane to that portion of the bill which provides for the imposition of duties. Now, Mr. Chairman, it has been suggested that there has been a ruling in a former House, and attention has been called to it, to the effect that it does not necessarily follow—and please bear in mind the effect of that language, that it does not necessarily follow—that an amendment proposed must be germane to the particular paragraph, provided that it is germane to another part of the bill. But under what conditions was that ruling made? It was on an internal-revenue bill, a bill which provided for the imposition of duties on tobacco and certain other products of the country. It was entirely devoted to that particular subject. It was an income tax, every section of which dealt with that particular subject, and that only, and the one subject running through it all, that of the imposition of the tax. It did not necessarily follow that the amendment therefore should apply to any particular paragraph more than to another. It was applicable to any portion of the bill. But we have a different condition presented now. When a bill is before the House containing two or three very distinct subjects, one imposing a duty, the other placing certain articles upon the free list, and another imposing certain conditions, then, for the orderly procedure of the business of the House and the orderly transaction of its business, it is incumbent upon the Chair to hold that each amendment shall be germane to that particular part of the bill to which it is proposed to apply it.

The Chairman ruled as follows:

The pending bill is to provide revenue for the Government and to encourage the industries of the United States.

Section 2 of the bill, on page 123, provides that after the 1st day of May the articles thereafter enumerated, when imported, shall be exempt from duty.

To the first paragraph the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Dockery] offers an amendment providing that under certain conditions all articles upon the dutiable list shall be transferred to the free list. To that amendment the gentleman from Maine [Mr. Dingley] raises the point of order that it is not in order at that point in the bill. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] cites a decision of the then Speaker in the Forty-fifth Congress, referred to upon page 271 of the Digest. That was a decision rendered by the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. Carlisle], acting as Speaker pro tempore. The decision, as shown by the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, does not carry out the statement upon page 271 of the Digest. That decision held that any amendment must be germane to the general provision of a bill. It did not hold that being germane to the provisions of a bill it was permissible at any point. It did hold that the amendment then presented to the bill at the point was admissible.

The question before the Chair here and now is not whether the committee is liable to reach page 123 of the bill. The Chair can not take into consideration that probability, as suggested by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Dockery], but must rule upon the question as it is now presented, to wit, Is the amendment presented germane to this provision? The Chair holds that the amendment is not germane, and therefore sustains the point of order.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this decision is identical, except that it reverses the position. The House then had under consideration the section of the Dingley bill that provided for taxing certain articles. The gentleman from Missouri, Mr. Dockery, offered an amendment providing that under certain circumstances and conditions some articles should be placed on the free list. The Chair held it was not in order because it was not germane to that paragraph of the bill, namely, the taxing paragraph. Now, here we reverse the position. We have an amendment relating to the free list. It is true that we have not a general bill before us, but we have a bill that relates purely and simply to the free list, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] offers an amendment providing that under certain terms and conditions the articles enumerated in this free list shall be placed on the taxing list. It is identically the case that was decided by the Chairman when the Dingley bill was before the House, except it reverses the position. In that case it was an effort to put articles on the free list when the taxing list was under consideration. In this case the gentleman seeks to put articles that are proposed to be placed on the free list on the taxing list, under certain conditions named in his amendment. I therefore contend the amendment is not in order at this time.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the precedent cited by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] has no relation whatever to the amendment which I have offered. What is the proposition now? It is to place certain articles which are now on the dutiable list upon the free list. What is the reading of the bill? It says:

That on and after the day following the passage of this act the following articles shall be exempt from duty when imported into the United States.

What is the amendment? It is to add to that:

From a country, dependency, province, or colony, being the product thereof, which imposes no tax or duty on like articles imported from the United States.

So that it would read:

That on and after the day following the passage of this act the following articles shall be exempt from duty when imported into the United States from a country, dependency, province, or colony, being the product thereof, which imposes no tax or duty on like articles imported from the United States.

Here is a proposition to place certain articles upon the free list, and I propose an amendment limiting the countries from which those articles shall come. It may be that they will come from all countries alike. No one can tell what will be the effect of the amendment, but the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] contends that it might result in some article which is named in this bill paying a duty. Does the gentleman propose to carry out his contention and say that it is not in order on this bill to offer an amendment to strike out any of these articles? Will the gentleman contend that it is not in order in the next paragraph to offer an amendment to strike out the word "plows," and yet if that word be stricken out it results in leaving plows upon the dutiable list? I do not propose an amendment to place any article upon the dutiable list. I simply propose an amendment which affects the articles which the bill proposes to place upon the free list. These articles are now upon the dutiable list. The amendment which I offered is not only germane to the bill, but it is germane to this particular paragraph of it. It is the place in the bill where it should be presented, and it can not be ruled out of order unless the chairman is prepared to rule that no amendment can be offered to strike out any of the articles named in this bill because striking them out would result in leaving them upon the dutiable list.

The CHAIRMAN. The rule relating to this bill is section 3 of Rule XXI, which provides that "No amendment shall be in order to any bill affecting revenue which is not germane to the subject matter in the bill." The general rule in force heretofore has been section 7 of Rule XVI:

No motion or proposition on a subject different from that under consideration shall be admitted under color of amendment.

These two provisions, it seems to the Chair, should be taken and construed together. The Chair takes it for granted that a motion to strike out any item in the pending bill would be in order. What the effect of that motion would be is not material from a parliamentary standpoint. The amendment here, however, is not a motion to strike out, but undertakes to modify the first clause of the bill, which is as follows:

That on and after the day following the passage of this act the following articles shall be exempt from duty when imported into the United States

And by adding an amendment:

From a country, dependency, province, or colony, being the product thereof, which imposes no tax or duty upon like articles imported from the United States.

The bill, as shown by its title, is a bill "to place on the free list agricultural implements, cotton bagging, cotton ties, leather, boots and shoes, fence wire, meats, cereals, flour, bread, timber, lumber, sewing machines, salt, and other articles," and the first clause following the enacting clause is to the same effect, that the articles enumerated in the bill shall be placed on the free list.

The effect of this amendment, if adopted, would be to place on the dutiable list all articles in this bill that might be imported into the United States from any country that did not admit the articles enumerated free of duty, and it therefore seems to the Chair that the amendment is obnoxious to the first clause of section 3 of Rule XXI, that "no amendment shall be in order to any bill affecting revenue which is not germane to the subject matter in the bill," and clearly, taking the title and the clause under consideration and the items enumerated in the bill, the purpose and intent is to place these articles on the free list, not from any particular country, but from all countries; and the Chair fails to see where the authority cited by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] is not in point.

As shown in that case, the Clerk has read the first paragraph of the tariff bill, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That on and after the 1st day of May, 1897, unless otherwise specifically provided for in this act, there shall be levied, collected, and paid on all articles imported from foreign countries or withdrawn from consumption, and mentioned in the schedules herein named, the rates of duty which are by the schedules and paragraphs respectively described, namely, etc.

Now, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. Dockery, simply provided that these duties should not be levied until it was shown to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Treasury that such articles are controlled or manufactured or produced in the United States by a trust or trusts. The Chair ruled as stated, Mr. SHERMAN, now Vice President, being in the chair, that the amendment was not germane, and sustained the point of order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer a further amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has not ruled on the pending amendment yet.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I beg the Chairman's pardon. I thought he had finished.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] offers the following amendment. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 1, line 5, by inserting, after the word "States," the following: "from a country, dependency, province, or colony, being the product thereof, which imposes no tax, or duty, or restriction by way of regulation or otherwise, upon the importation from the United States of live cattle, meats of all kinds, fresh, dried, smoked, salted, in brine, canned, or prepared, or preserved in any manner."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order, for the same reason I did as to the other amendment. I think the same reasoning applies.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I should like to be heard on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. The Chair sustained the point of order to the other amendment on the ground that it would place certain articles upon the dutiable list. That amendment was general in character, applying to countries which did not admit free the articles named in the bill when imported from the United States into those countries. This amendment proposes a mere limitation upon the countries, so that articles shall be admitted free of duty coming from any country which does not restrict the importation of meats going from the United States into that country. Will it be claimed on the other side of the House that a proposition to place articles upon the free list can not be accompanied with a proposition that we shall obtain some advantage for our products to be exported? Will it be claimed on the majority side of the House that a proposition to admit meats coming from a foreign country can not be restricted to countries which admit meats going from this country to the foreign country? Will the gentleman claim that an amendment is not germane which says that if we admit meats free coming from England, England must first admit meats free going from this country to England? Why, it is the very essence of the proposition.

If gentlemen desire to hide behind a proposition of this sort, that the amendment is not germane, they may be able to secure a ruling from the Chair to that effect, but they will have the responsibility of saying that they propose to admit articles free of duty without obtaining any benefit whatever to the producers of the United States. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Suppose, Mr. Chairman, the bill read, as it might well have read, that—

The following articles shall be exempt from duty when imported into the United States from all foreign countries.

Would the gentleman claim that an amendment limiting all foreign countries by excepting one would not be germane? It is the very essence of the proposition. If you say "from all foreign countries," certainly an amendment is germane which proposes to except from the operation of that general provision a particular country.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I understood the Chair to say that the reason for this ruling was because this would place certain articles upon the dutiable list; but the Chair will recall in a moment that no amendment which I have offered places any article upon the dutiable list. These articles are now upon the dutiable list. The proposition of the bill is to remove certain articles from the dutiable list and place them upon the free list. We certainly have the right, by germane amendment, to limit the articles which shall be so placed upon the free list.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. In a moment. If the Chair holds that no amendment is germane which leaves one of those articles upon the dutiable list, will there be a corresponding holding that no amendment is germane which places an additional article upon the free list?

If so, the bill can not be amended at all. Now, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], a distinguished parliamentarian.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, this bill is a bill to exempt certain imports from duty. Is that not a fact? I will read the title——

Mr. MANN. Oh, the gentleman will not find that in the title. The title says it is to place certain articles on the free list and the bill says it is to exempt them from duty.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman proposes an amendment which goes entirely beyond the scope of this bill and completely changes its character.

Mr. MANN. Not at all. Here is a bill to place certain articles upon the free list. My amendment leaves the articles upon the free list.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Not necessarily.

Mr. MANN. Well, not necessarily. They may not be from any of these countries.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman is proposing to regulate the tariffs of other nations, which are not affected at all by this bill as it stands at present.

Mr. MANN. I did not understand what the gentleman said. What the proposition is——

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will repeat it. The gentleman is attempting to regulate the tariffs of other nations which are not at all affected by the bill as it stands.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; not at all. We do not regulate the tariffs of other nations. What we regulate and what we have the right to regulate is the importations which come into the United States from other nations. We passed the reciprocity bill here the other day, which the gentleman voted for, which contains reciprocity propositions. Does the gentleman claim that bill could not be amended?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, what happened in the House demonstrated that it could not be amended. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. I voted with the gentleman against the amendment, but the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], one of the ablest parliamentarians in this House, held, right in line with this proposition now presented, that the amendment was in order at the time, and the gentleman from New York knows that that rule was right, and he knows that this amendment is in order, germane not only to the bill but to the paragraph in the bill to which it is offered.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, the proposition offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is not a new one to this House nor to the country. It comes in here under the old Standard Oil Co. provision, which it took a revolution in this House two years ago to get rid of. It is exactly in line with the amendment that prevented Russian oil from coming into this country in competition with the oil fields of America, and if I am not mistaken the gentleman from Illinois voted with this side of the House to wipe out that iniquity at that time. Now he proposes to apply the same proposition to the articles that we seek to place on the free list. Unfortunately, the gentlemen on that side of the House, in contending for their expansion of trade and development of commerce with other nations, can never look at the great proposition from any other standpoint than the standpoint of the manufacturer. [Applause on Democratic side.]

We have written this bill for the benefit of the American people, and not for any other purpose, and we have intended that there shall be no limitation whatever, so far as these articles are concerned, upon the importations of competing articles from abroad. That being the case, it seems to me, you can not differentiate in any way between the amendment that the gentleman offered a few moments ago and the amendment that he offers now. The amendment that he first offered was, under certain terms and conditions, to restrict importations. The gentleman can not deny himself that, under certain terms and conditions, if this amendment was adopted, importations would be restricted, and they would be put on the dutiable list; and therefore I say that the decision of the Chair on the former amendment equally applies to this.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, the question presented to the Chair is not a question of legislative policy, it is a question of parliamentary law. The fact that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] may or may not like the subject matter presented for legislation has nothing to do with the rights of Members as to amendment. The purpose of this bill is to admit free of duty, and free of duty without restrictions, certain articles enumerated. It might be in order to strike out some of those articles, but inasmuch as the very essence of the subject matter of the bill is that the articles enumerated shall be free of duty, anything that undertakes to qualify that freedom from duty changes the subject matter of the bill. That is the parliamentary proposition presented to the Chair, and not the gentleman's idea as to what this side of the House, as a party, may or may not want to do. I submit that under both the old rule as to germaneness and under the rule recently adopted as to revenue bills, a limitation that does restrict the freedom of import, as to this bill, is out of order because not germane to the subject matter.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman, if I may be permitted just a word. It has often been held in line with the decision already cited that in a general tariff bill where there is one provision or several provisions placing duties upon certain articles, and in another section or another paragraph of the bill there is a free list, it has been held, and properly, I think, that you can not, while considering the dutiable list, insert articles which are to be placed on the free list, because they are more appropriately in order when we come to the section providing for the free list. But this is not that kind of a bill. Here is a bill providing that a long list of articles shall be exempt from duty. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois relates precisely to the same articles, or some of them, that are carried in the bill itself. It does not place them on the dutiable list. They are dutiable now under the present tariff law. The amendment provides, as this bill provides, for placing them upon the free list. The amendment is upon the same subject as the bill. Now, the gentleman from Alabama says they have introduced this bill for the benefit of all the people, and they have not intended there should be any restrictions upon its provisions, and therefore no amendment is in order which contains any restrictions. That statement strikes me as equivalent to asking the Chair to rule according to the rule of a party caucus rather than according to the rule of this House, which rule, as the Chairman has already read, requires that the amendment shall be related to the same subject matter as the bill. Can anybody pretend that the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois does not relate to the same subject matter? It merely qualifies; it provides that they shall be put upon the free list providing so and so, except so and so. Did anybody ever hear of a rule so construed that you could not qualify a provision in a bill by an appropriate proviso or an exception?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair calls the gentleman's attention to the fact that the case he cites is just such a case as that. The Chair would like to hear the gentleman distinguish, if he will.

Mr. OLMSTED. That was a case, if I understood the reading of it, where a bill had several provisions in it, one providing a free list and another a dutiable list. The proposition there was to amend the dutiable list by putting certain articles on the free list. The Chair held that that was not germane because the proposed amendment had relation to a different part of the bill.

Mr. SHERLEY. But was not this the fact, that on a certain contingency certain articles should be taken off the dutiable list and placed on the free list? Now, is not the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois that on certain contingencies certain articles shall be taken from the free list?

Mr. OLMSTED. No; they are not on the free list now; you are proposing to put them on the free list.

Mr. SHERLEY. Oh, but legislatively, from a parliamentary standpoint, they are on the free list, as stated in this bill. Now, the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois is certainly the converse of the proposition of the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. Dockery. His proposition was to take from the dutiable list certain articles where they were controlled by a trust. The proposition of the gentleman from Illinois is to take from the free list certain articles when the country from which they are imported does not permit our importations free.

Mr. OLMSTED. The earlier case was on a bill which had two provisions in it, one a dutiable list and the other a free list; and it was while they were discussing the dutiable list—concerning the dutiable list—that he proposed to put certain things on the free list, and the Chair very properly held substantially that that would be in order when it came to the free list; but this bill is not of that character. It provides only a free list. It puts nothing on the dutiable list.

This amendment does not propose to put anything on a dutiable list. It says that they shall go on the free list provided the countries from which they come are treating our people in a similar way. It is a qualification; it is a restriction; it is an exception; it is a qualification to the provisions in the bill; it is upon the same subject. It is not governed at all by the earlier decision. I do not think it is affected by the decision which you, Mr. Chairman, have just made. These articles mentioned in the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] are not on the free list under existing law. They are dutiable now. This amendment does not propose to put any duty on them. It leaves them right where they are now unless certain conditions are fulfilled, in which case they shall go on the free list, which is the object of this bill. The amendment is upon the same subject matter as the bill. It merely qualifies what is already in the bill. Now, it seems to me that the amendment can not be ruled out of order without going further than any Chairman has ever gone in the direction of holding that a bill can not be amended at all.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is, in substance, identical with the first amendment, except that the articles enumerated in the bill are named in the amendment. That is all the difference. The first amendment provided as follows:

That on and after the day following the passage of this act the following articles shall be exempt from duty when imported into the United States:

Now, the following amendment was offered:

From a country, dependency, province, or colony, being the product thereof, which imposes no tax or charge on like articles imported from the United States.

Now, the clause in the bill says:

That on and after the day following the passage of this act the following articles—

Enumerating them.

Now, the second amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois simply enumerates the articles, namely, live cattle, meats of all kinds, fresh, dried, smoked, salted in brine, canned, or preserved in any manner.

Now, there is not, as the Chair has stated, any difference between the two amendments, in substance, except instead of referring to the articles in general terms, as stated in the paragraph, the amendment enumerates them in detail.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] states that this is a bill with but one purpose, namely, to place articles on the free list. That is true. The Dingley Tariff Act not only provided for a dutiable list, but a free list. But the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri was to place on the free list certain dutiable goods. It was offered to a paragraph in the tariff bill relating to goods on the dutiable list, and it was held—and the Chair thinks properly—that that amendment was not germane to the provisions of the bill. But suppose an amendment had been offered to the free list to place certain articles enumerated on the free list on the dutiable list, would not the same rule obtain, and is not that the proposition here? This is a proposition, as clearly shown, to place certain articles on the free list. The effect of the amendment would be to place certain articles upon the dutiable list coming from a country discriminating against the importations from this country.

Now, as to the policy of admitting goods from foreign countries that discriminate against us, of course, the Chair has no concern. The only question for the Chair to determine is whether or not this amendment is obnoxious to the rule. It has been decided—and I think the decision is in point—to the effect that the subject matter is not germane to the bill. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer a further amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend page 1, line 5, by inserting after the word "States" the following:

"From a country, dependency, province, or colony, being the product thereof, which imposes no tax or duty or restriction, by way of regulation or otherwise, upon the importation from the United States of wheat flour."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I make the same point of order, for the reasons assigned, that I made to the other amendment. It is an identical case.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers the further amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend page 1, line 5, by inserting after the word "States" the following:

"From a country, dependency, province, or colony, being a product thereof, which imposes no tax or duty or restriction, by way of regulation or otherwise, upon the importation from the United States of lard and compounds thereof, cottolene, and cotton stearin and animal stearin."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make the same point of order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, just very briefly: The Chairman's ruling was that the adoption of this amendment would place certain articles upon the dutiable list. But the Chair evidently lost sight of the fact that these articles are now upon the dutiable list, and the proposition is to place certain articles upon the free list, and the amendment simply restricts the articles which are to be placed upon the free list, precisely the same thing as it would be to move to strike out one of the articles named in this bill.

Suppose, for instance, in the paragraph commencing on line 9 of page 3, when it is reached for consideration, providing for biscuits, bread, wafers, and similar articles not sweetened to be placed upon the free list, some gentleman moves to strike out the word "not." Does the gentleman hold, and will the Chairman hold, that an amendment to strike out the word "not" can not be made, and that it is not in order because if stricken out it would leave upon the dutiable list wafers not sweetened, and would place upon the free list wafers sweetened?

Is the result of all the turmoil and discussion that we have had throughout the country in favor of more liberal rules in the House, and the right of more individual freedom in the House—is the result of that a ruling and a rule under which you can not strike out the word "not" in a bill? You can neither add to or take from the bill if you follow the logic of the Chairman's ruling.

Now, I have offered an amendment providing that these articles shall not come to this country free of duty from any country which does not admit our lard and cottonseed oil free into that country. Is that amendment not in order? Have we no right, when we propose to admit boots and shoes free into this country, to say at the same time, "We will do it only from a country that admits our lard and our cottonseed oil free into their country"? Is that the result of the liberalization of the rules in the House under a Democratic majority?

This bill, as it stands, proposes to open the ports of the United States to manufactured products of foreign industry and foreign labor and contains no line or syllable in it which would in any way extend the trade of the United States. I wish to add something to it in the interest of the American laborer, the American agriculturist, the American producer, so that in exchange for opening our ports to the foreign products we shall require foreign countries to open their ports freely to our products. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is in principle the same as the former amendment, and the point of order is sustained.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I respectfully appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois appeals from the decision of the Chair. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Chairman, I move to lay that on the table.

The CHAIRMAN. That can not be done in committee.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman should learn something about parliamentary law.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. MANN. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 145, noes 103.

The CHAIRMAN. The decision of the Chair is sustained.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] will take their places as tellers.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I yield as teller in favor of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL].

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will appoint the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] as teller instead of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 175, noes 105.

So the decision of the Chair was sustained.

The announcement of the result of the vote was received with applause on the Democratic side.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 1, line 5, by inserting, after the word "States," the following:

"From any country, dependency, province, or colony which does not impose any export tax or charge of any kind upon or in any way restrict the exportation to the United States of crude potash or black salts, crude or refined carbonate of potash, hydrate of or caustic potash, crude nitrate of potash or saltpeter, crude or refined sulphate of potash, or muriate of potash."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make the same point of order upon the same ground.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard upon the point of order. The ruling of the Chair, which has been sustained by the committee, was made upon an amendment which proposed that only articles should come in free from countries which admitted our articles free of duty there, certain articles named. This amendment proposes that only articles shall come in free from those countries which permit the free exportation of potash. We are met with this situation in the world. Potash is the basis of the fertilizers of the country. It is produced mainly in one country, and restrictions are now imposed on exportations of that potash.

Our farming community which depends on fertilizers are at the mercy of that one country. We propose to admit articles coming free from that country free of duty into our country, and I propose an amendment that before articles coming free from that country shall be admitted free of duty that country shall remove restrictions now existing upon the exportations of potash from that country to this country. Does anyone say that is not germane, that we can not make a trade in our own interests when we propose to admit articles free of duty?

This is not the same proposition that was presented before, and if the rules of this House provide that an amendment like that is not germane, then it is time that the rules were in fact changed. If the rules have become so illiberal that when we propose to let in boots and shoes free from Germany we can not say that it shall be on a condition precedent that Germany shall permit the free exportation of potash from there to this country, then the rules are not liberal enough, not as liberal as they have been in the past, when, as you gentlemen on that side of the House said, we had Czar CANNON in the chair, because no chairman in the past has ever ruled that an amendment like that was not in order. Nor can gentlemen on that side of the House hide behind a ruling, because a year ago you declared that it was right to institute a revolution in the rules in order to accomplish a certain purpose, and if in fact, as you profess, you were endeavoring to legislate in the interest of the farmers of the country you will legislate so as to secure to them cheap fertilizers. You can do it in spite of a ruling of the Chair by overruling the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is prepared to rule. This amendment is identical in principle with the former amendments. That certainly is clear to everyone. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I respectfully appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois appeals from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, upon that appeal I desire to detain the committee for a very few moments. The Chair holds that under the rules this amendment is not germane. I will not discuss the propriety of that ruling further than to say that I protest against the ruling, and upon the appeal shall vote against sustaining the Chair. I protest because we are piling up a lot of precedents here that, in my judgment, violate every precedent that has been made from the beginning, and will turn, perchance, to plague the majority in future Congresses. I read from Jefferson's Manual and get back to the general principle, page 222—and Jefferson's Manual is made part of the rules of this House:

If an amendment be proposed inconsistent with one already agreed to, it is a fit ground for its rejection by the House, but not within the competence of the Speaker to suppress as if it were against order. For were he permitted to draw questions of consistence within the vortex of order, he might usurp a negative on important modification, and suppress, instead of subserving, the legislative will.

The note under this ruling of the House, read from Jefferson's Manual, is as follows:

The practice of the House of Representatives follows and extends the principle set forth by Jefferson. Thus it has been held that the fact that a proposed amendment is inconsistent with the text or embodies a proposition already voted, or would in effect change a provision of text to which both Houses have agreed, or is contained in substance in a later portion of the bill, is a matter to be passed on by the House rather than by the Speaker. It is for the House rather than the Speaker to decide on the legislative effect of a proposition, and the change of a single word in the text of a proposition is sufficient to prevent the Speaker ruling it out of order as one already disposed of by the House.

Now, this amendment provides in this bill placing upon the free list certain articles which are not dutiable that it shall not apply to the articles mentioned, the fertilizers particularly that are produced in Germany, upon which, by the action of Germany, we can not have them, however much we may need them, at a fair price. To say that we can not limit as to a country, one or several, the operation of a free-list bill is upon a question of order to deny to the people's Representatives the power to express their will. [Applause on the Republican side.] There is not, after somewhat of a careful examination, in my judgment, to be found anywhere in any precedent such a ruling sustained. It is perfectly patent that following the caucus dictation of a majority that you are to pass this bill without the dotting of an "i" or the crossing of a "t," but we ought not to authorize you to escape the responsibility upon a point of order of voting direct in committee. Therefore, having submitted this much, I will not multiply words and would not have submitted it were it not that I can not sit by silent when I see a great majority trampling under foot all correct principles of parliamentary law without making my protest. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, if the ruling of the Chair were based upon the grounds stated by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], I should not attempt to support the ruling. I believe it can be fairly said that there is some difference of opinion as to the proper way in which the ruling should have been made. I judge that from the fact that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], who proposed the first amendment, was so doubtful as to whether it was in order that he had the same amendment prepared in three or four different forms in the hope that one of them might be in order, although the others were not. The Chair has not held this amendment out of order, because the Chair has taken the ground that the amendment is inconsistent with some amendment previously adopted or some part of the text. Reading from Jefferson's, following that already read by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], it is found that he states the general parliamentary rule to be as follows:

Amendments may be made so as totally to alter the nature of the proposition; and it is a way of getting rid of the proposition by making it bear a sense different from what it was intended by the movers, so that they vote against it themselves. A new bill may be engrafted, by way of amendment, on the words "Be it enacted, etc."

If that were the rule of the House, it being a general rule of parliamentary law, as stated by Jefferson, there would be no question that the pending amendment would be in order, but that is not the rule of the House. It has been changed, I believe, as far back as 1822, by a provision which requires amendments to be germane to the proposition under consideration. Now, what is the subject matter in this bill? That is the question that must be determined in order to determine what amendments are in order to the bill, and I take it from an examination of the bill that the subject matter in the bill is a proposition to exempt from duty certain enumerated articles imported into the United States. Any amendment which would totally alter the nature of the proposition would have been in order under general parliamentary law, but it is not in order under the rules of the House at present, and I assume that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] realizes that every amendment proposed by him thus far would substantially change the character of this bill and that they are offered in the hope that, having substantially changed the character of the bill, this side of the House might do what Jefferson said was frequently the hope of those proposing amendments—compel the friends of the bill to vote against it after it had been so substantially changed.

These amendments, as I understand the ruling of the Chair, are held not to be in order because of the fact they do substantially change the character of the bill. The ruling is based upon the ruling, cited several times, made by one of the most distinguished parliamentarians who ever sat in this body, the present Vice President, that amendments to a free list which would propose to place limitations somewhat similar upon the operation of legislation removing the duties were not in order to the bill. I find it difficult to differentiate this situation from the situation outlined in the reasoning of Mr. SHERMAN when he was Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, but whatever doubts I may have had upon the accuracy of the ruling have been completely removed in the failure of all gentlemen upon that side of the House to advance either a single precedent or a convincing argument as to the accuracy of their contention.

Mr. MANN. I understood the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] to say that it was not in order to offer an amendment which substantially changed the character of a bill or which, if adopted, might cause the author of a bill to vote against it?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The latter part is a non sequitur.

Mr. MANN. That is what the gentleman stated, however.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I stated what Jefferson said as to making an amendment so as to substantially change the character of a bill. And I do not think the gentleman from Illinois would be unhappy if he could so amend this bill as to make it so obnoxious to this side of the House that they would be compelled to vote against it.

Mr. MANN. I do not see how that has to do with this. Do I understand the gentleman's position to be that it is not within the power of the House by amendment to change substantially the character of a bill that is presented to the House?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman must comply——

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman does not change the remarks he has made in the House, I am willing to let it go at that.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will read what Jefferson said.

Mr. MANN. That is the statement made by the gentleman, and I wish to inquire of him if the Chair or the author of the bill determines if it is substantial in character or not.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think it is very easy to determine. This is a bill proposing to place on the free list certain enumerated articles. I take it that nobody would question that a proposition, if offered by the gentleman, to strike out certain words and insert others, so that the bill would read, "The following articles shall be subject to a duty of 25 per cent ad valorem," would so completely change the nature of the proposition under discussion that it would not be germane. I will call the gentleman's attention to two decisions.

Mr. MANN. I would rather have the gentleman's opinion than the decision which he reads.

Mr. FITZGERALD. They were made by Republicans, and I have a higher regard for them now than I have had at times in the past.

Mr. MANN. You can take decisions and read them in any way you want to. The gentleman's opinion would have weight with me if he is prepared to say it is his real opinion. I would like to inquire of the gentleman in what respect, under the gentleman's proposition, can this bill be amended?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I would not like to suggest an amendment to the gentleman from Illinois, because I hope we will complete the consideration of this bill some time to-day.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman think there will not be a to-morrow, and that it is not possible to consider a great bill on two days? Is there such great haste about it, after having empty benches for two weeks, that the House can not consider it when there are Members present? Is that side of the House afraid to discuss this bill when we have Members here in the Hall of the House?

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the gentleman had thought that the arguments advanced by that side of the House would have had any appreciable effect upon Members here or the Members who should have been upon that side of the House, he could very easily have compelled a quorum to be present and listened to all of the speeches.

Mr. MANN. I have never been in favor of cruelty to animals or cruelty to human beings. [Laughter.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Having listened to some speeches made on that side, I agree with the gentleman. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. MANN. No doubt they seemed cruel to that side of the House because they told the truth, much to your chagrin.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman should not complain about no opportunity being given to consider amendments to this bill, for——

Mr. MANN. I am not complaining.

Mr. FITZGERALD (continuing). Certainly the gentleman has been tolerated to offer a number of these amendments after it has become apparent to him that under the rulings already made they could not be voted upon, and nobody has even objected to the gentleman under the pretense of discussing the question of order involved in discussing the merits of the proposition which he has advanced. And, considering the way that side of the House has operated during the past 16 years, it comes with poor grace from anyone on that side to suggest that this side of the House is exhibiting undue haste in the consideration of any of the legislation thus far offered to the House. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I think I have said now, Mr. Chairman, with those concluding words, all I care to say on the question of the appeal.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER]?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. May I ask the gentleman whether, in his opinion, a proviso would be in order——

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will assume the position of the courts of the country, and until questions are presented to me I decline to express my opinion, because the Chair might not agree with an opinion expressed under the circumstances.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield for a question, or will he not?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will yield to the question, with the admonition that I have already made.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I want to ask the gentleman whether in his opinion a proviso would be in order in the leather paragraph, for instance, to this effect——

Mr. FITZGERALD. To which paragraph?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. To the leather paragraph, in line 17 of page 2, to this effect:

Provided, That after October 1, 1912, a certain rate of duty should be charged on that leather.

Would that, in the gentleman's opinion, be in order?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will answer the gentleman. No; it would not.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Now, then, I call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that in the present law that is exactly the way free hides were arrived at.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Then that would be an additional reason for our not favoring it, regardless of its merits as a parliamentary question. There is nothing in the present tariff law that appeals to me. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield or not yield? [Laughter.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman asked me a question.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I can not take the floor from the gentleman unless he yields.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I thought the gentleman had yielded the floor to me, and he can not take me from the floor and yield it to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Instead of desiring to ask me a question merely, it seems the gentleman desires me to yield him the floor. Well, I yield the floor. [Laughter.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Does the gentleman yield or not? [Laughter.]

SEVERAL MEMBERS. He yields.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Now, Mr. Chairman, paragraph 450 of the tariff law is included in the dutiable list; but there is a proviso, to which no point of order was raised——

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman will remember that that provision was not offered while the bill was under consideration in this House. My recollection is that it originated out of this House, and that nobody had any opportunity to make a point of order against it.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Oh, I am not at all sure of that. [Laughter on the Democratic side.] Is the gentleman sure of his facts? Is the gentleman himself sure? [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will say to the gentleman——

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, we are neither of us sure. But I called the gentleman's bluff. [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, however that may be, yet, to the best of my recollection—and I will ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] whether he is sure again—— [Laughter.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. To the best of my recollection that provision did not originate in the bill by amendment when it was under consideration in the House. I think my recollection on that will agree with the recollection of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I dislike to call the attention of the gentleman to the necessity of his addressing the Chair and asking me to yield. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair suggests that both gentlemen address themselves to the question under consideration. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I am addressing myself, Mr. Chairman, to the question of an appeal from the decision of the Chair on a point of order. When I shall have done that, I shall sit down.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not understand that he has gone that far.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. The Chair called me to order for not speaking to the subject under consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not know whether he has spoken to the point or not, but the conversation between the gentleman from Massachusetts and the gentleman from New York did not refer to the question under consideration. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I am very sorry, Mr. Chairman, that I could not put any prophetic ideas into the mind of the Chair; but, to my mind, this has a very material bearing on the question of overruling the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will proceed in order.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Now, Mr. Chairman, under the present tariff law this very item of plows, tooth and disk harrows, and so forth, has an amendment to the effect that when foreign nations charge import duties on those articles we shall charge 15 per cent on similar articles imported into this country. Now, a good many years ago, I think during the passage of the Dingley bill, was it not——

Mr. RUSSELL. It was not. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. That proviso was offered on the floor of the House or on the floor of the Senate at the very time that the Dingley law was passed, and, in default of either body holding it out of order at that time, it clearly would not be proper to hold out of order a precisely analogous provision at the present time.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. SHERLEY. Does the gentleman think that a particular tariff bill, dealing with one subject, is open to the same parliamentary rule as a general tariff bill?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, that can not——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I would like to answer the gentleman from Kentucky first.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I can not give any preferred yielding just at present. I am dealing with an ordinary yielding.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I wish to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I am trying to answer the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY]. The gentleman from Kentucky knows very well that it has been decided over and over again that you can not amend a particular proposition by general propositions or by adding other particular propositions. He is right so far; but he knows also that the rulings have been that when there has been a large group of particular propositions offered, then it is in order to amend by adding any proposition which is in its nature—the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] may shake his head when I have finished my statement—I repeat that it is in order to amend by adding another proposition properly relating to the particular proposition.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman's qualification saves the day for him.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. The gentleman shook his head before I had a chance to state my qualification.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman has referred to the provision in the paragraph in reference to plows——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I do not yield. I shall not even reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Then, Mr. Chairman, I shall take the floor for the purpose of making a brief statement. Paragraph 476 of the present law is practically the same as the same numbered paragraph in the Dingley law respecting the fixing of the duty on plows and certain other agricultural implements; and that paragraph was not read in the House when either bill was under consideration, and nobody had an opportunity to raise a point of order to the proviso.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I said either in the Senate or in the House. The gentleman is correct in his statement that it was not read in the House, but the Senate made a great number of amendments to the Wilson bill, which you adopted in one solid bunch.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The Senate rules have no application whatever in the House.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. The question of germaneness is the same in both.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, no; if the gentleman had looked up the Senate rules lately, he might have saved himself from making the statement which he has just made.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. The only difference is that the Senate votes on the question of germaneness.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Vote! Vote!

Mr. HINDS rose.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I do not like to move to close the debate and thereby cut off the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HINDS], but I will ask unanimous consent that the debate on this bill be closed in 10 minutes. The gentleman from Maine may have 5 minutes of that time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the debate on this proposition close in 10 minutes, the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HINDS] to have 5 minutes of that time. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. HINDS]. [Applause.]

Mr. HINDS. Mr. Chairman, the language of the rule of this House as to germane amendments is fairly clear. In addition to that, nearly 25 years ago that rule was construed by one of the greatest Chairmen and Speakers who ever sat in that chair, Mr. Carlisle, of Kentucky. He said:

> When, therefore, it is objected that a proposed amendment is not in order because it is not germane, the meaning of the objection is simply that the proposed amendment is a motion or proposition on a subject different from that under consideration.

That is the rule, as clearly defined in the language of that distinguished Chairman, as it is defined in the rule of the House.

Applying that test, what is the subject of this bill? The subject of this bill is that a certain enumerated list of articles shall be admitted free into the markets of the United States from all nations. That is the subject—free admission of those articles into the markets of the United States from all nations; and the amendment which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] proposes is in effect simply this: The free admission of all these articles from all nations except Germany.

The amendment of the gentleman from Illinois merely puts into diplomatic form that exception. It is intended to except from the nations that shall be allowed free entry that one nation which excludes the potash used in fertilizers. Therefore, the exception is a part of the rule. The rule is the subject, and when you make an exception to the general rule, that exception must be germane, for it is a part of the same thing.

When you say in that bill that you admit these articles free from all nations, you put in the subject of free admission from all nations; and when you say all nations except a certain classification of nations, then you have merely put in an exception that applies to the same subject, or that belongs to the same subject, or, in the language of Mr. Carlisle, the proposed amendment is a motion or proposition on a subject the same as that under consideration. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, if the gentleman is right that it would be in order and germane to except Germany, then why could we not except every nation on earth by name, one by one?

Mr. HINDS. Oh, I assume there are some things that you would not do.

Mr. HARDWICK. I am speaking of the parliamentary status.

Mr. HINDS. Parliamentarily, perhaps, you could.

Mr. HARDWICK. Could not we say except Germany and France and England, and how far could you go along that line?

Mr. HINDS. As far as common sense dictated.

Mr. HARDWICK. That is exactly what the Chairman is doing to-day.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I have a very vivid picture before me. Fourteen years ago the present Vice President of the United States was sitting in that chair. The distinguished gentleman from Maine [Mr. HINDS] was standing on his right hand, his chief advisor as to parliamentary law, and when Mr. Dockery, of Missouri, arose in this House, practically where I am standing to-day, and offered as his amendment to the Dingley bill that all articles that were made by a trust in this country should be put on the free list, and cited the decision that the distinguished gentleman from Maine has called to the attention of the Chair, by Mr. Carlisle, the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House, Mr. SHERMAN, held it was out of order, in the decision that I read to the Chair this morning. [Applause in the Democratic side.]

Mr. HINDS. Mr. Chairman, may I call the attention of the gentleman from Alabama to the great distinction between these two cases. The Chairman did not then——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I thought the gentleman tried to draw the distinction in his speech a moment ago, and I did not see it.

Mr. HINDS. Perhaps I might make the gentleman see it now.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will suggest to the gentleman that he had half of the time that was left for debate.

Mr. HINDS. Oh, as the gentleman was indulging in reminiscences which are the common treasure of both of us, I did not know but what I might participate in the memories. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, the decision of Mr. Carlisle that the gentleman from Maine has just referred to was called to the attention of the Chair 14 years ago, and the Chair in his decision distinctly said that that decision did not cover this case in point.

As I said, the distinguished gentleman from Maine was standing at that desk, the parliamentary adviser of the Chair at that time. What I say is this, that if it was not in order to change the Dingley bill by offering an amendment that put trust-made articles on the free list at that point, it is clearly not in order to change the substance of this bill, that is a free-list bill, by adding to it an amendment that under certain conditions would make it a tax-ridden bill. Therefore I think the decision of the Chair is not only clearly in order, but it is clearly within the precedents that have been established for many years by that side of the House. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman from Alabama define what a trust-made article is in contradistinction of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Oh, well, to put any article on the free list would be the same thing.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the decision of the committee?

The question was taken, and the decision of the Chair stood as the judgment of the committee.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Amend, page 1, line 5, by inserting after the word "States" the following: "from a country, dependency, province, or other subdivision of government, being the product thereof, which does not impose any export duty, export license fee, or other export charge of any kind whatsoever upon, or which does not prohibit or restrict in any way the exportation of, news-print paper, wood pulp, or pulp wood."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that I made as to the other amendments, and for the same reason, and I make the further point of order——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the appeal is dilatory.

Mr. MANN. Oh, it is not dilatory.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is; the Chair has passed upon this question twice.

Mr. MANN. I do not care how the Chair rules on it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I call the attention of the Chair to the fact that it is the same question.

Mr. MANN. Has the Chair ruled upon the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not hear the point of order made by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the appeal is dilatory. The committee has already passed on the same question and the Chair has sustained the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order will be overruled. Does the gentleman from Illinois desire to be heard?

Mr. MANN. I do not desire to be heard.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the decision of the committee?

The question was taken, and the decision of the Chair was sustained.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 1, at the end of line 5, add the following:

"Provided, That the exemption from duty on the articles named in the following paragraphs shall constitute the minimum tariff of the United States thereon, and that the rates of duty prescribed upon said articles in an act entitled 'An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes,' approved August 5, 1909, shall constitute the maximum tariff of the United States upon said articles; and whenever after the passage of this act, and so long thereafter as the President shall be satisfied, in view of the character of the concessions granted by the minimum rates herein provided, that the government of any foreign country imposes no terms or restrictions, either in the way of tariff rates or provisions, trade or other regulations, charges, exactions, or in any other manner, directly or indirectly, upon the importation into or the sale in such foreign country of any agricultural, manufactured, or other product of the United States, which unduly discriminate against the United States or the products thereof, and that such foreign country pays no export bounty or imposes no export duty or prohibition upon the exportation of any article to the United States which unduly discriminates against the United States or the products thereof, and that such foreign country accords to the agricultural, manufactured, or other products of the United States treatment which is reciprocal and equivalent, thereupon and thereafter, upon proclamation to this effect by the President of the United States, all of the articles named in the following paragraphs when imported into the United States, or any of its possessions (except the Philippine Islands and the islands of Guam and Tutuila), from such foreign country shall be admitted under the terms of the minimum tariff of the United States as prescribed herein. The proclamation issued by the President under the authority hereby conferred and the application of the minimum tariff thereupon may, in accordance with the facts as found by the President, extend to the whole of any foreign country, or may be confined to or exclude from its effect any dependency, colony, or other political subdivision having authority to adopt and enforce tariff legislation, or to impose restrictions or regulations, or to grant concessions upon the exportation or importation of articles which are or may be imported into the United States. Whenever the President shall be satisfied that the conditions which led to the issuance of the proclamation hereinbefore authorized no longer exist, he shall issue a proclamation to this effect, and 90 days thereafter the provisions of the maximum tariff herein prescribed shall be applied to the importation of articles from such country. Whenever the provisions of the maximum tariff herein prescribed of the United States shall be applicable to articles imported from any foreign country, they shall be applicable to the products of such country, whether imported directly from the country of production or otherwise."

During the reading of the above,

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that this is out of order, on the same grounds I made before.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I will not ask for the further reading of the amendment; but I am offering the amendment in good faith. I will ask unanimous consent that the amendment, without further reading, may be printed in the RECORD as part of my remarks.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have no objection.

Mr. HILL. And then I want to be heard on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent that the proposed amendment may be printed, without being further read, as a part of his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HILL. Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to be heard on the point of order. As I drew this amendment, Mr. Chairman, originally, I had in it the proposition against which the Chair has ruled, providing that importations coming from countries which laid a duty upon like importations from this country should be dutiable. I have stricken it out, without regard to whether I consider the decision of the Chair correct or not. I have stricken it out in deference to his decision, and the amendment as it now stands, Mr. Chairman, bears practically on only one point. If you will look at the bill you will find it is to go into effect on and after the day following its passage. It is certainly in order to amend the bill providing when the bill shall take effect, and the amendment which I propose provides it shall not go into effect until the President has issued his proclamation, providing that certain countries have not made discriminations against exports from this country into those countries on agricultural and other products.

It is solely a question of time. Now, I submit, not to your parliamentary knowledge, but to your common sense, the proposition whether an amendment here providing that this bill shall not go into effect until a certain date would not be in order—for example, that the bill shall not go into effect until the 8th day of May, 1913, or that it shall not go into effect for six months. This proposition is that it shall not go into effect until certain facts have been ascertained by the President. It does not change an item in the bill; it does not cover anything except what is mentioned in the bill; it does not provide any higher duties than those that now exist; but it does provide that your free list just as you have got it shall go into effect, not on the date provided in this bill, but on another date, to be determined by the President of the United States after he has ascertained certain facts. If that is not germane, if it does not fit this particular proposition, purely a question of time, then no amendment can be offered to this measure.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HILL. Certainly.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Suppose the President never ascertains those facts and never issues a proclamation?

Mr. HILL. Then it would never go into effect.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. The bill would not go into effect?

Mr. HILL. The bill would not go into effect.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. And you absolutely defeat it by an amendment, and change the object of the bill?

Mr. HILL. Absolutely. If you suppose such a condition of things as that is possible, then you ought to vote against it.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. That admission makes it very clear your amendment is not in order. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HILL. Not at all. It is offered in absolute good faith. I want to say, furthermore, that I have prepared 10 or a dozen amendments to this bill, every one of them absolutely in good faith, in order to perfect it. If this amendment is not germane none of them is. That amendment is just as germane to this bill as the maximum and minimum provision is to the Payne tariff bill, and, as I have drawn it, it leaves it now simply a question of time as to when it shall go into effect; and have we not a right to amend that? Have we not perfect power, Mr. Chairman, to do that? You say this bill shall go into effect on and after its passage. I say this, that it shall go into effect, not on and after its passage, but when the President shall have ascertained certain facts he shall issue his proclamation and the bill shall go into effect then, and not until then.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Now, in answer to the gentleman, you might make it take effect at a certain time, but when you couple with it provisions that make it impossible to ever become operative then your amendment is not germane.

Mr. HILL. The gentleman's question impugns the good faith of any administration.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Oh, no; I do not impugn the good faith, but say if the gentleman's other amendments are not more germane than this he would better offer them all now, and we will vote them all down at once.

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman hold that an amendment offered substituting for "on the day after the passage of this act" the words "the 1st day of January, 1912," would be in order?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I think it would as to time, but where you couple with it conditions making it impossible for it ever to take effect, that is another question.

Mr. HILL. The question of whether it is impossible or not has nothing to do with the case.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the gentleman yield, so that I may ask the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] a question?

Mr. HILL. I will.

Mr. NORRIS. The gentleman from Texas has based his objection to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut on the ground that it is impractical and will not go into effect, because he thinks the President would not do what the amendment contemplates.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. That is only one of the conditions.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to ask the gentleman if that has anything to do with the determination of the parliamentary situation? Suppose his amendment provided that, instead of the day following the passage of this act, as stated in the bill, it should not go into effect for 100 years after the passage of the act. Now, that would be impracticable, but would it not be in order as a parliamentary proposition?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I would say to the gentleman, no; that would be absurd and nonsensical, and it would not be entertained for a minute, because it would defeat the purpose and effect of the bill.

Mr. NORRIS. I admit that it would be a good reason for voting against the amendment, but it would not be any reason why the Chair should hold it out of order.

Mr. HILL. Just one moment, in answer to the question of the gentleman from Texas——

Mr. NORRIS. I wanted to ask him another question.

Mr. HILL. In answer to the question of the gentleman from Texas I will answer it from the terms of the amendment, which I will not read, as to when it will go into effect and how.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I heard a part of it, but not all of it.

Mr. HILL. Upon proclamation by the President of the United States to this effect—that all the articles named in the following paragraphs, when imported into the United States or any of its possessions, except the Philippine Islands and the islands of Guam and Tutuila, from such foreign countries shall be admitted under the terms of the minimum tariff of the United States, as prescribed herein.

I am not offering this amendment to embarrass you. I want this amendment incorporated in order to put this bill in such a shape that we can get a lever under some of these countries that are not dealing fairly with us [applause on the Republican side], and in order that we shall get from them some consideration for what we propose to give them.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Let me say to the gentleman that he is not embarrassing us at all, because, as this session progresses, we shall give the people all the relief to which they are entitled in the direction referred to by the gentleman. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I am not talking politics at all. I want to see good legislation enacted. If this bill is to go into effect, I want to see it go into effect in such a way as will do us some good, and I can not understand how an amendment of this kind, which relates simply and solely to the time of its going into effect and to the manner of its going into effect—an amendment that provides for and practically indorses your free list—should not be considered germane and in order.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I am afraid the good legislation which the gentleman refers to would be too sectional, and not extend throughout the country, and therefore believe that the gentleman's amendment would change the object of this whole law, and prefer to stand on it as it is.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Connecticut yield to the gentleman from Nebraska?

Mr. HILL. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I ask recognition in my own right. I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] and other Members of the House to the fact that his objections to this amendment and his reasons for calling it out of order have no basis whatever in reason or in logic. He says it will defeat the purposes of the bill. Of course the amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut will not defeat the purposes of the bill, but even if it is does change it, it is not out of order as a parliamentary proposition. There is a difference, and the gentleman ought to be able to see it, between voting against an amendment because he does not favor it and holding out of order one which he does not favor. He says it would defeat the object of the bill. Suppose the amendment were offered here to strike out the enacting clause of the bill. Would the gentleman hold that that was out of order? Yet the effect of it would be to defeat the bill.

He says an amendment that would change the date on which the bill shall go into effect would be out of order if it defeated the purpose of it. Instead of having it go into effect the next day after it is passed, as the bill provides, suppose I offered an amendment here to the effect that it should go into effect on the second day after. Would that be in order? I will ask the gentleman from Texas, Would it not be in order to say it should go into effect on the second day instead of the first day after its passage?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I think that would be in order.

Mr. NORRIS. But suppose the amendment provided that it should go into effect the next year. Would that be in order? Where do you draw the line?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. One might offer an amendment providing that the bill should go into effect next day or next year, and in either case the bill would still become effective. It would be a reasonable amendment. But when you say it shall not go into effect until a hundred years from now you defeat the object and purpose of it and change the trend and effect of the legislation.

Mr. NORRIS. Ah, the gentleman draws a line. It must follow, as a matter of parliamentary law, that the Chairman has no right to draw that line, and we can use our judgment when we vote on the amendment.

Mr. SHERLEY. I want to suggest to the gentleman this idea, which seems to have been forgotten by him and each Member on that side of the House in discussing the proposition:

Broadly speaking, the general rule of parliamentary law is that the chair has nothing to do with the substance, but must look only to form. The gentleman, of course, will concede that.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. But this proposition is unquestionably true, that when you have raised the question of germaneness, by the very virtue of the point of order you do require a consideration not only of form, but of substance, to the extent of seeing whether it is germane or not, and that must be so. Now, if the gentleman will permit me further, the vice of the gentleman's proposition is this: Manifestly it would be in order to change the pure question of time as to when an act shall take effect.

Mr. NORRIS. Let me ask the gentleman right there——

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. Would it be in order as a parliamentary proposition to provide that it shall not go into effect for three years after it is passed?

Mr. SHERLEY. I think so.

Mr. NORRIS. Would it be in order to provide that it shall not go into effect for 10 years?

Mr. SHERLEY. I think so.

Mr. NORRIS. Then, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] will have to settle their dispute. If that be true, let me ask the gentleman, would it not be in order to provide that it should not go into effect until after some investigation had been made, like that provided for here, to be made by the President?

Mr. SHERLEY. Now the gentleman comes to the real proposition that I would have come to if he had let me finish my idea. Unquestionably it is in order to put a limitation of time purely, but whenever you make that limitation of time conditioned upon a fact precedent, that changes the entire character of the bill. Then under the rule of germaneness it is not in order. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. NORRIS. The gentleman's abstract proposition is correct; and if we had an amendment here the effect of which would, for instance, provide for a crime—for stealing a horse, for robbing a bank, or for something of that kind—his objection would be good; but this amendment does not do any of those things. Neither do any of these amendments that have been offered do any of those things. It is the common practice of parliamentary procedure to provide that a bill shall not go into effect—as, for instance, in the reciprocity bill, that it shall go into effect when Canada shall provide for the enforcement of some particular law.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NORRIS. This amendment proposes that this shall go into effect when the President shall have done certain things. I am not arguing whether the amendment is a good one or not. That is not the proposition here. The entire argument that has been made, at least by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY], the chairman of the great Committee on Rules, is that it ought to be held out of order by the Chairman, because the amendment in fact is something that you ought to vote against. Now I will yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman has used an illustration which I think will clarify the matter very much, namely, the reciprocity bill. Does the gentleman think it would have been in order on the reciprocity bill to provide that that bill should not go into effect until a similar reciprocity treaty had been made with all the nations of the earth?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Oh, that is quite a different case entirely.

Mr. SHERLEY. The very effect of that would be to change the reciprocity bill into a general tariff bill.

Mr. NORRIS. All right. While I believe that is true, it does not apply here at all. It has no application to this particular bill that we are considering, or to this particular amendment, because this seeks to do nothing of that kind.

Mr. MANN. This deals with all the nations of the earth, and the reciprocity bill does not.

Mr. NORRIS. The gentleman's illustration has no application.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. The gentleman misapprehended me if he thought I said this amendment ought to be held out of order because we ought to vote against it. I did not say that. I said it ought to be held out of order because it changed the purposes of this bill.

Mr. NORRIS. And the gentleman said if we offered an amendment that it would not go into effect this year—that ought to be held out of order.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Yes——

Mr. NORRIS. Well, I submit the gentleman's idea and respectfully call it to the attention of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] and they can decide it between them. Now, I want to say that I have no other object than to pursue parliamentary tactics here that shall not in the future come home to bother any of us. I have no political or partisan feeling in this matter, but I want to call attention to the fact that you can not afford, regardless of what the political exigencies of the moment may appear to be, to hold out of order amendments of this kind that any man knows, if he will exercise his ordinary common sense and good judgment and dismiss his prejudices, are in order; and they ought to be met squarely and fairly. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say only a few words, so that the RECORD can show clearly the parliamentary situation as to this amendment as I see it. The present tariff laws have a first section that relates to these articles that are taxed and another section that relates to the free list.

Mr. MANN. Oh, the gentleman is mistaken; it is all in one section.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am not talking about this bill.

Mr. MANN. And I am talking about the Payne tariff law.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, call it a paragraph.

Mr. MANN. I did not help make up the bill, as the gentleman did, but I am aware of that fact.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am talking about a paragraph, if not a section—and another section or paragraph that contains the administrative features of the bill. In those administrative features of the bill it provides for a minimum and maximum tariff rate on all dutiable articles imported into this country, the minimum tariff rate to be the present law and the maximum tariff rate to be 25 per cent more than the present law. The gentleman's amendment does not change the date when this shall go into effect. The gentleman's amendment takes the articles enumerated in this bill and creates a new maximum and minimum tariff law in reference to these particular articles. It has nothing to do with the date. It is absurd to claim that it merely changes the date. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] knows better than that, if some other gentlemen do not. I changes the substance of the law; it reenacts a new maximum and minimum tariff law in this country so far as these articles are concerned, and says that this free list shall be the minimum rate and the Payne tariff law the maximum rate.

Now, if the Chair was right in holding in accordance with this decision of the Chairman, Mr. SHERMAN, 14 years ago, that it was not in order to take an article off the dutiable list and put it on the free list, it is certainly not in order for this amendment to take it from the free list and reenact, so far as these articles are concerned, a new maximum and minimum tariff law for the United States.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, we have certain articles in the Payne bill on the dutiable list. The majority come in here and say that we want to put a certain number of those articles, giving the names of them, on the free list. There is the situation. You can say what you please in order to mystify it. You want to put upon the free list 20 or more articles that are now on the dutiable list. I come in with an amendment and I say, Yes, when the President shall issue his proclamation, and so long as the conditions exist under which the proclamation is issued, your articles shall stay on the free list. If at any time in his judgment it is not for the welfare of the United States, and if other countries are treating us unfairly, he shall withdraw his proclamation, so that you stand with your free list in perpetuity, subject to fair and honest and honorable treatment by the other nations of the world, and we are entitled to that. It is simply a question not only of your free list going into effect now, but how long it shall be in operation. If you intend to say we are going to do it on and after the time of the passage of this bill and in no other way, and there shall be no amendment to the time when it is to go into operation, of course my amendment is out of order, and I am through offering amendments.

But if we have the privilege of offering amendments as to when it shall go into effect, we have the privilege of making one of the conditions the time of the issuance of the proclamation by the President of the United States.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. Is not the objection raised by the gentleman from Texas disposed of by this fact, that the gentleman from Connecticut acts under the same presumption in offering this amendment that the gentleman from Alabama does in presenting the bill, and that is that the President of the United States will perform his duty?

Mr. HILL. Of course; and I would assume that of any President—Republican, Democrat, or Socialist.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. In other words, if the amendment offered by the gentleman is adopted, its going into effect will depend upon the act of the President. If the bill offered by the gentleman from Alabama is passed by this House, its becoming a law will depend also upon the act of the President in attaching his signature to it. In both cases a presidential act is essential before the law becomes effective.

Mr. HILL. Why, of course.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will send up his amendment. The Chair is ready to rule on the pending amendment. The Chair does not hold and would not hold that an amendment providing that this bill should not go into effect for one year or any number of years would not be in order. That is not this amendment. It does not purport to be the purpose of the amendment, but the amendment, in the opinion of the Chair, completely changes the scope and purpose of the bill in its substance, and is not germane, and, for the reasons already stated, the point of order is sustained.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Dakota offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting, after the word "articles," in line 4, page 1, "the growth, product, or manufacture of the Dominion of Canada."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make the same point of order I made against the other amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained. [Applause.]

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 5, after the word "States" insert:
"Provided, That boots and shoes shall be exempt from duty only when imported from a country which admits free of duty boots and shoes of American manufacture."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order for the same reason that it is similar to the amendments offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say just one word. I have offered this amendment in perfect good faith. Germany, France, and certain other countries impose a duty of 30 per cent on American boots and shoes, and it seems to me in order, Mr. Chairman, to add to this bill a provision that we should admit free of duty only boots and shoes from those countries, and there are one or two, which admit boots and shoes of our manufacture free of duty. Now, of course, if the point of order is sustained it will prevent the House or this Committee of the Whole House from voting upon this amendment and will prevent discussion of its merits. I had hoped that the gentleman from Alabama would not insist upon making his point of order. If he does, in view of the rulings already made, it is useless to consume time upon the discussion. I do not agree that the rulings already made have been correct, but of course they will be followed. I hope the gentleman from Alabama will permit a vote to be taken upon this amendment which is so important to the boot and shoe industry of the United States, and to that end will not insist upon his point of order. I should like to discuss the amendment upon its merits, if the point is withdrawn.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I must insist upon the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 5:
"Provided, That in the absence of any special agreement between the United States and any other country, when the Tariff Board, or its legally designated successors, determines that the labor cost of producing any article mentioned in this bill is less in any foreign country than in the United States, a duty shall be imposed equal to such difference when any such article is imported into the United States."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make the same point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of line 5, page 1, add "from any other nation."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I make the point of order against that.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard briefly on that point of order. The other amendments have been in effect held to be out of order because they changed the bill. Now, this amendment does not change the bill a particle. It does not add anything to it; it does not take anything away from it; its legal effect would be absolutely the same if it were adopted as it would be if it were not adopted; and it seems if all amendments are out of order because they change the bill, we, at least, might prepare one that would be in order because it does not change the bill. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order in this instance is overruled.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman offers an amendment, I——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] offers an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. MANN. I offer an amendment by inserting at the end of the amendment which is proposed the following, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment to the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add after the amendment proposed:
"Being the product thereof, which imposes no tax or duty or restriction, by way of regulation or otherwise, upon the importation from the United States of live cattle, meats of all kinds, fresh, dried, smoked, salted, in brine, canned, or prepared or preserved in any manner."

Mr. NORRIS. I accept the amendment, Mr. Chairman. [Laughter.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois to the amendment that is pending.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. MANN. Does the Chair decline to hear me on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not care to hear the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. Very briefly? It is impossible to hear the Chair at this point on the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that he is doing his best to keep order, but can not do so all the time.

Mr. MANN. Does the Chair decline to hear me on the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I appeal from the decision of the Chair sustaining the point of order.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the appeal comes too late.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; it does not come too late.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman, I withhold my amendment. It seems there is one already pending. I had forgotten that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] is still pending.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks leave to withdraw his amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I ask for a vote on the pending amendment. I move that all debate on the pending amendment be now closed.

The CHAIRMAN. There is an appeal pending.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I made the point of order that the appeal was too late. Has the Chair ruled on that? The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] was in his seat, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] rose and offered an amendment. He yielded the floor, and some time after the Chair had ruled.

Mr. KENDALL. There was some dilatoriness arising, I think, from the fact that the gentlemen could not hear the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. It is true that the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] had offered his amendment, and the gentleman from Illinois had offered an amendment to the amendment, and the gentleman from Alabama made the point of order against the amendment, which was sustained by the Chair. The Chair then recognized the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] to offer an amendment, but there was great confusion in the Hall. The Chair has no disposition to cut off an appeal from a ruling of the Chair, so, holding the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] as not in order, yet if he insists on his appeal the Chair will put it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I appeal. I wish to be heard for a moment on it.

The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] offered an amendment providing for imports coming into the United States from all foreign nations. Now, it has always been the rule as parliamentary law that it was within the power of the legislative body to make a limitation or exception from the general rule laid down; that where the proposition is to admit products coming from all foreign nations, that embraces products coming from less than all foreign nations, and it is within the power of the legislative body to limit by taking the lesser number rather than the whole number. If you propose a proposition providing for a hundred things, it is within the power of the legislative body to take a lesser number by amendment.

While I think that this proposition demonstrates the absurdity of holding that the other amendments were not in order, yet the Chair having now held that the amendment of the gentleman from Nebraska is in order, I do not see how it is possible to escape the conclusion that my amendment to his amendment is also in order. [Applause on the Republican side.]

He proposes to admit products from all foreign nations. I propose to admit products from all foreign nations which do so and so. The greater includes the lesser. The proposition offered by the gentleman from Nebraska includes the amendment which I have offered, and we have the right to put it in the form of an amendment so that we take in a less number than is proposed by the original amendment.

Every principle of parliamentary law, every decision which has ever been made prior to to-day, holds that that amendment and that proposition is in order when it is presented. If the Chair had followed the ruling that he had already made, he would have ruled out the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska. But having admitted it, it is subject also to germane amendments.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I merely have this to say: It has been repeatedly held—held so often that it is not necessary to cite the precedents to the House—that where an amendment is offered to a germane amendment but which is not germane to the original paragraph it is not in order.

Now, the Chair has held, and the committee had already held, that the amendment that the gentleman from Illinois now offers was not germane to the original paragraph of the bill, and to offer it to an amendment that is held to be in order still makes valid the point that it is not germane to the amendment—just as valid as if it were made to the paragraph.

Mr. MANN. There has been no debate on that.

Mr. NORRIS. I would like to be heard briefly on that.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on the appeal be closed in five minutes. I make it five minutes, and yield that time to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama moves that all debate upon the appeal be closed in five minutes. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I do not think I shall consume all that time, even, but I would like to call the attention of the Chair and the attention of the committee to the particular words that are included and that constitute the amendment which I offered. It adds in line 5, after the end of the line, these words: "From any other nation."

Now, assuming that that amendment is in order—it has been so held by the Chair, and no appeal has been taken, and that much is determined. The amendment is therefore in order. Suppose, now, when I had offered that amendment I had said instead, "from any other nation except Great Britain." Would that exception have made any difference in the parliamentary situation? Or suppose I had said, "from any other nation except those which are at war with us." That would not have made any difference with the parliamentary situation.

Suppose I had added, "from any other nation except those that are now putting an export tax upon certain commodities." That would not have made any difference with the parliamentary situation, although I confess each one of them might make a difference as to whether we would vote for or against the amendment.

Suppose I had said, "From any other nation except those that refused to admit certain articles from our country free," or had made any other exceptions. Is there anyone who would say that from a parliamentary standpoint, from a legal standpoint, it would make any difference with the amendment? Now, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] simply puts a limitation on the amendment that I have offered. It is no more than as though to an appropriation bill appropriating $50,000 he had offered an amendment making it $25,000, or than if he had put a limitation on it that the $50,000 should not be expended until certain conditions had been complied with. It is a proposition that has been up in this House at least ever since I have been a Member of it, and without any exception it has always been held by all chairmen who have ever presided in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union that such amendments were in order. [Applause on the Republican side.] Why, gentlemen, you do not have to be parliamentarians in order to determine this. You only have to exercise ordinary common horse sense in order to be able to see clearly that this limitation, proposed by the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, to this amendment that has been held to be in order makes no difference as far as the parliamentary situation is concerned; and if we will follow our ordinary idea of fairness and justice and throw aside all other feeling there can be but one holding, and that is that this amendment, offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] to the amendment offered by myself, is absolutely in order under every precedent and every rule of law, equity, and common sense. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to make a suggestion to the gentleman from Nebraska. His amendment, in effect, amounted to nothing. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. NORRIS. That is what I said; but it seemed to be a pretty good thing to hang something on that did amount to something.

The CHAIRMAN. It does not change the text of the bill at all. The paragraph applies to all nations without that amendment.

Mr. MANN. It does change the text of the bill but not the meaning of it.

The CHAIRMAN. It does not change the meaning of the bill.

Mr. MANN. The Chair said it did not change the text of the bill. It does change the text of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. It simply makes that certain which was clearly implied before. Now, to contend that an amendment which is not germane may be offered as an amendment to one which is germane, the Chair wishes to say to the gentleman from Nebraska, with all respect, has never been held by any parliamentarian within the knowledge of the Chair. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HILL. I wish to ask whether the amendment of the gentleman from Nebraska does not change the bill in this respect——

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is closed.

Mr. HILL. I wish simply to ask, does it not change the bill in this sense, that in the gentleman's bill importations will be into the United States from all nations? Now, under the gentleman's amendment, would it not affect Porto Rico, the Philippine Islands, and Hawaii?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to discuss that proposition. Debate is closed, and I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is closed. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the decision of the committee?

The question being taken, the decision of the Chair was sustained.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS].

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 3, after the word "the," strike out "day following the passage of this act," and insert in lieu thereof "1st day of January, A. D. 1925."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Does the gentleman desire to discuss the amendment?

Mr. OLMSTED. No; it is perfectly plain.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Let us vote, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED].

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting, after line 5, page 1, as a new paragraph the following:

"Unpolished, cylinder, crown, and common window glass, not exceeding 150 square inches, not specially provided for by law."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane to the bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard on the point of order. I would like to hear the gentleman from Alabama first.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I think it is so apparent that it is not germane to the bill that I will be glad to hear the gentleman explain how it is.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the amendment which I have offered proposes to put window glass of the size 10 by 15, such as is used very largely in farmers' windows, upon the free list. The title of this bill is to place on the free list agricultural implements, cotton bagging, cotton ties, leather, boots and shoes, fence wire, meats, cereals, flour, bread, timber, lumber, sewing machines, salt, and other articles. The title of the bill would cover window glass—farmers' window glass. This bill has been frequently denominated the farmers' free-list bill. I have proposed an amendment to put farmers' window glass on the free list. It is covered by the title of the bill.

Now, will it be said that no item can be added to this free-list bill except the ones which have been incorporated in it by a Democratic caucus? Is there nothing that can be added to the bill? As a parliamentary proposition, are the gentlemen on that side of the House so afraid to vote upon amendments that they propose to violate every principle of parliamentary law as it has been enunciated hundreds of times by chairmen in that chair? What is the distinction in the bill between plows on the free list and window glass on the free list? If the bill had said to put on window glass and not plows, would it be in order to name plows on the free list? This bill does not undertake to name every item not in the title. The gentleman has a proposition on the bill to put on all other agricultural implements of any kind and description in general language. Will it be said that in an ordinary tariff bill you can not add new items to the bill? Is the Chair prepared to hold that in a free-list bill other articles can not be mentioned and provided for in the bill? Have we reached that point in parliamentary control in the House that this House is powerless to add any item to the bill? The Chair ruled a moment ago that we could not add an amendment, because it would restore some of these items to the dutiable list. Is the Chair now prepared to rule that you can not add any item to this bill because it will take an item away from the dutiable list? Have we neither the power to add to the bill nor take from the bill? What is the object in meeting? Why not let the Chair pass the bill after the gentleman from Alabama has presented it to the House. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Now, farmer's window glass is just as necessary for the farmer as cotton gins or horserakes. It may be in some parts of the country they do not need window glass so much as they do in other parts; but in the great North and Northwest windows are necessary, and window glass is necessary for windows. This proposes to exempt from duty that kind of glass, size 10 by 15, which the farmers use, which the laborer uses, which goes into the cheaper homes, and provides that that shall go upon the free list.

Is it not in order to provide that we may put this character of article upon the free list? Is there no way by which Congress can do that? Here is a bill pending before us to put "other articles" upon the free list. "Other articles" includes any article which can be mentioned, and I insist that the House has the power, if it chooses to exercise it, to adopt the amendment and that it is not for the Chair to say this changes the substance or the character of the bill. The amendment which I have offered is germane to the bill. It is offered as a new paragraph. To say that an amendment to put another article on the free list is not germane to a free-list bill is to make yourself ridiculous in the eyes of the people. You have come into power by claiming that you wanted to have greater liberality in rules, and yet no Chairman during my 14 years of service in this House has ever ruled as you are now asking the present Chairman to rule. It is not akin to the case which has been cited, where it was held that under a tariff bill carrying a dutiable list and a free list it was not in order to insert in a dutiable list an item on the free list. That is a matter of make-up of the bill. But no Chairman has ever held in any tariff bill that it was not in order, at the proper place, to put any item on the free list or any item upon the dutiable list. When the present Vice President of the United States, Mr. SHERMAN, was in the chair he did not rule that it was not in order when you reach the free list to add any item to the free list. He did not rule when you were on the dutiable list that you could not put any item on the dutiable list; he only ruled that when considering one of these lists, the dutiable or the free list, that that was not the proper place to insert an item relating to the other; and I insist that we have a right to have a fair—as I believe we will have—ruling from the Chair undeterred by terror of a Democratic caucus. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] this morning cited Jefferson's Manual as to what was germane and what was admitted as germane to a bill pending before the House. Of course, under general parliamentary law the latitude of amendment is very much greater than it has been in this House for many years. From time to time the House has found it necessary in order to do business to hold down amendments in the House and in Committee of the Whole to the subject matter of the bill pending before the House or Committee of the Whole. We in the past for many years have seen bills brought into this House where the majority were unwilling to submit them to the consideration of the House for any amendment. When the Payne tariff bill, with all its many sections affecting the entire tax laws of the United States, was submitted to this House for consideration, the House was allowed to vote on five separate propositions by a special rule prohibited from an opportunity for amendment, and some of the gentlemen whom I see before me now sitting on that side of the House who have contended that they were progressives and who have stood for the right of the people to enact the law as their Representatives saw fit, are recorded in the records of this House in favor of voting for that rule that passed the Payne tariff bill with its 4,000 items [applause on the Democratic side] with only an opportunity to amend on five separate propositions. Now, since that time the President of the United States has said that he believed that it was wise to amend these tariff bills schedule by schedule, not to bring them all before the House en masse, but only to bring enough for the House to carefully consider and understand. Some of the progressive Senators at the other end of this Capitol have offered a joint rule to limit amendments to bills brought into the House to the particular subject matter brought before the House, and it is apparent why that is necessary. The House in the beginning found it necessary to appoint committees in order that they might properly and carefully consider the legislation necessary in the country before it was admitted to this House.

If you allow a bill to come before the House that has been considered by a committee and then leave it open to all kinds of amendments that have not been considered by the committee or digested at all, why you might as well abolish your Committee on Ways and Means and the other committees of the House and say that the House will legislate itself without the assistance of committees. Now, carrying out that idea, in conformity with that idea legislation coming before this House should first be considered by the committees of the House——

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. UNDERWOOD (continuing). And tariff legislation should only be considered that was germane to the bill pending——

Mr. PAYNE. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. PAYNE. Do I understand that this bill was ever considered by a committee? [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. MANN. Of the House.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, coming from the source——

Mr. PAYNE. Never mind the source, answer the question if the gentleman can——

Mr. UNDERWOOD (continuing). A gentleman who has just been repudiated by the people of the United States on a bill that he claimed to have been considered is not in a position to ask as to whether this bill has been considered. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. PAYNE. If the gentleman will allow me, it is not on account of the bill—not at all on account of the bill, but because of the lies that were told about it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am satisfied that the people of the United States thoroughly understood the gentleman's bill.

Mr. PAYNE. I am satisfied that even the gentleman from Alabama has not understood it, from his report on this very bill. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Now, Mr. Chairman, in view of the position that we have taken, to amend the tariff laws by schedules and by separate bills, it was deemed necessary that we should bring in a rule that would limit the consideration of the bills we brought before this House to the subject matter contained in those bills. We therefore at the beginning of this Congress adopted this rule:

RULE XXI.

SEC. 3. No amendment shall be in order to any bill affecting revenue which is not germane to the subject matter in the bill.

Now, if language expresses anything, can it be more clear than that no amendment shall be in order which is not germane to the subject matter in the bill? Now, I admit that that is a change of the rules of this House, to some extent. It is certainly a change of the law that existed under the parliamentary procedure when Jefferson wrote his Manual. You can take the four corners of this bill—and it is a bill to put plows, agricultural implements, bagging and ties, leather, and boots and shoes, barbed wire and fencing, meats, flour, timber, sewing machines, and salt on the free list—and is there a single item or paragraph in the bill in which you can say that an amendment to put glass on the free list is germane to the subject matter in the bill? If you can relate it to any subject matter in the bill, I would like to see how you can do it.

Mr. DALZELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will.

Mr. DALZELL. The gentleman mentioned everything except the last three words of the title. What is the significance of "and other articles" at the end of what the gentleman saw fit to recite?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is merely the title to the bill. I did not write the title to it. I introduced the bill without the title and it was written by the Clerk.

Mr. DALZELL. The gentleman recited the title to the bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I thought you meant the original. I did not recite the title to the bill.

Mr. DALZELL. The gentleman recited the title to the bill down to and including the word "salt."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I must say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that I was not reading from the title, that I was reading from the bill, and, as I said, the bill was introduced without the title, and he must refer to the clerks for the title.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will.

Mr. LONGWORTH. This bill provides that all wire suitable for fencing shall be placed on the free list. In the gentleman's opinion, would not an amendment be in order putting all wire on the free list?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will discuss that when we reach that paragraph, if the gentleman desires to offer an amendment. I do not think an amendment to put glass on the free list is in order because there is wire in the bill.

Mr. LONGWORTH. But the gentleman will not say at this time that the amendment would not be in order?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will discuss the amendment when he offers it.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with much of interest to the leader of the majority in his remarks upon this point of order. He has had considerable latitude and, notwithstanding that latitude, from his standpoint his remarks evidently are germane to the point of order. Therefore I shall crave a little bit of latitude in replying to him touching this point of order.

Here is a House of Representatives consisting of 391 Members, representing 92,000,000 people—a House with plenary power to do whatever a majority desires to do. It organizes, it adopts rules, it appoints committees, one of the greatest of which, if not the greatest—it is the greatest when revenue legislation is pending—is the Committee on Ways and Means. That committee is supposed to have prepared a bill and from the calendar reports that bill to the House, where it is now pending. Under the rules that this House adopted, it goes to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and yet the gentleman says, "What do you think a committee is for if the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union can change anything in the bill that this great Ways and Means Committee reports?" Great heavens! Is the Ways and Means Committee, consisting of 22 Members of this House, so great that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union can not even offer a germane amendment, and it be in order? "Upon what meat doth this our Cæsar feed that he has grown so great?" [Applause and laughter.] Is the creature greater than the creator? "Oh," but says the gentleman, "we are estopped from offering this amendment, because when the Payne tariff bill passed through the House after long debate and amendment, the House, under the rules of the House, adopted a special rule by majority vote of the House, under which that bill was specially considered, ordering the previous question after several days of discussion and pointing out what amendments might be offered, which was vitalized by action of the majority."

If with your majority you can not allow germane amendments to be considered, amendments that address themselves, in substance, to the provisions of this bill, then bring in your special rule, and then it becomes a rule of the House when you vitalize it. It is a rule, then, of procedure by the grace of a majority and not by the grace of the creature that is created by the House. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The gentleman cites a special rule here—a change in the rule. It says:

No amendment shall be in order to any bill affecting revenue which is not germane to the subject matter in the bill.

This is germane. It puts another article on the free list. What is this bill? It is a free-list bill. The rule further provides:

Nor shall any amendment to any item of such bill be in order which does not directly relate to the item to which the amendment is proposed.

What is every item in this bill? A free-list item. And if it is impossible either to add or to take from by germane amendment items on this bill, why then the majority has shackled itself and shackled the House, and any construction of this rule that keeps a majority from putting any or all items upon the free list, if there be a majority for such action, puts it in the power of one man, the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, to step in by his ruling and defy a majority. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Now, that is about all I want to say touching this matter upon its merits, which have been referred to. The amendment puts one additional item that the common people in this country—farmers, agriculturists, and everybody—use, namely, common window glass, upon the free list. Now, without regard to the merit of the amendment, you gentlemen on the other side will go to your constituency and say, "We are the friends of the people." [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] In so saying you may think, like the ostrich that sticks its head in the sand, that you are hiding your bodies, but you are not. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] undertakes to support his position by stating that the President of the United States and certain gentlemen at the other end of the Capitol have advocated the proposition that he now advocates. I want to say that neither the President of the United States or any Republican or any Democrat has ever before to-day advocated the proposition now advocated by the gentleman from Alabama. The gentleman from Alabama and the majority have undergone a lightning change of position within the last 15 minutes. Up to the time that the amendment now pending was offered they took the position that this new rule, reading—

No amendment shall be in order to any bill affecting revenue which is not germane to the subject matter in the bill—should be construed as meaning "subject matter of" the bill, for they then said that the subject matter of this bill was the free list, and it being the free list, an amendment was not germane that interfered with the free list in any way.

Now, they have got past that proposition, and with the amendment that is now pending they try to get the other construction, and say it is not the "subject matter of" the bill now, but it is the "subject matter in" the bill.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from Nebraska?

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. I would like to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the Chair, in making his decision, referred to the title of the bill as being a free-list bill.

Mr. LENROOT. Now, where, under any parliamentary precedent, or any rule of parliamentary law, was the ruling of the Chair justified on these amendments that had been offered, except upon the construction of this rule, that it was the "subject matter of" the bill?

If it had been construed as the subject matter in the bill, of course these amendments were then in order, every one of them; and I submit that you should not play fast and loose in the construction of this rule. You stood upon the other construction then; you ought to be willing to stand upon it now.

And further, the second part of this rule provides:

Nor shall any amendment to any item of such bill be in order which does not directly relate to the item to which the amendment is proposed—

If it was not for your prior construction, then it would be in order to offer an amendment to every item in this bill, proposing any duty that the mover of the amendment might choose, and the only way that you could avoid that and hold it not in order was by construing the first part of the rule as meaning "the subject matter of the bill."

Now the subject matter of the bill is the free list, and that being so, any amendment that proposes to extend the free list is and must be clearly in order. Now the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] says that if the construction of the gentleman from Illinois shall prevail, then we will have the position of the House saying that it will legislate for itself, without the assistance of committees. But, Mr. Chairman, if the construction of the gentleman from Alabama shall prevail, then we have the Democratic majority taking the position that its committees will legislate for the country, without the assistance of the House. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, the majority of the House do not wish to evade the true intent of this rule, and are willing to see it properly construed and enforced.

When the rules were adopted, the gentlemen on the other side were so well content with them that they did not see proper even to call for the yeas and nays and record their votes against them.

Let us take the rule to which they object and analyze it. We are perfectly willing to defend its policy. Whether it is a good or bad policy, that question has been passed upon by the House, and the rule has been adopted.

There are two parts to it. The Rule XXI, clause 3. Let us analyze it for a moment.

No amendment shall be in order to any bill affecting revenue which is not germane to the subject matter in the bill; nor shall any amendment to any item of such bill be in order which does not directly relate to the item to which the amendment is proposed.

Is this amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] germane to the subject matter in the bill? He offers it as a new section. What is the subject matter in the bill? Let us look to its provisions for a moment. There are 10 subject matters in this bill; first, one relating to agricultural implements; second, another to bagging for cotton, and so forth; third, another pertaining to hoop or band iron, and so forth; fourth, another one relating to leather; fifth, another one to barbed-wire fencing, and so forth; sixth, another relating to beef and meats; seventh, another to buckwheat flour, and so forth; eighth, another including timber, lumber, and so forth; ninth, another one providing for sewing machines; and tenth and the last, one relating to salt.

Does this amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] relate to any one of these ten subjects.

For illustration, if it were an amendment relating to some kind of "leather" that is not contained in the bill, then undoubtedly the amendment would be in order; but it goes beyond the subject matter of this free-list bill altogether and injects into it another and different subject, and therefore it can not possibly be germane to the subject matter herein embraced. Anyone can take the bill and read the various items enumerated and set out there, and it is plain that the amendment does not apply to a single one of them.

Again, when you get down to the other phrase of the clause, let us examine it from that standpoint.

Nor shall any amendment to any item of such bill be in order which does not directly relate to the item to which the amendment is proposed.

To what item in this bill does that amendment "directly relate"?

Mr. MANN. It is not offered as an amendment to any item in the bill. Can not the gentleman read the language of the rule?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I have read the language, and I am showing the gentleman that the amendment which he proposes is out of order, because it does not relate to the subject matter in the bill. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. The gentleman has not read the amendment and does not understand the rule.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I have read the amendment and I understand it, and have read the rules and understand them, and understand the gentleman from Illinois also.

Mr. MANN. But the amendment is not offered as an amendment to any item in the bill.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. No; it is offered as a new section.

Mr. MANN. To be correct, it is offered as a new paragraph.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. A new paragraph then, if the gentleman wants to split hairs.

Mr. MANN. I do not want to split hairs, but I wish to use correct language in description, which the gentleman never does.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Of course, that is from the standpoint of the gentleman from Illinois, and hardly from the standpoint of anyone else informed on the subject. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Mr. Chairman, it is evident the gentleman is undertaking to place new subject matter in the bill. We stand by the rule, we are willing to defend its policy, and if the gentleman is not able to write an amendment that is germane, and he says he knows all about the rules and parliamentary law, that is his fault, and not of the majority. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Fully realizing the true import of the verbiage and intent of the clause, I take the position that this amendment is not germane. It was not intended that such amendments should be germane under the new rule. Gentlemen are complaining that we are cutting them off from the right of amendment. We are not doing so; but are giving them the right to offer germane amendments, as many as they please, and when they are able to write one that is sound and tenable it will be considered.

It is a strange and amusing thing to see the distinguished gentleman from Illinois—and I refer to the ex-Speaker of the House of Representatives [Mr. CANNON]—appearing here as "counsel" for the people. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Why, Mr. Chairman, if he was so anxious to put these things on the free list, if he wanted to revise the tariff in behalf of the American people, why did he not do it during his eight years' incumbency as Speaker of the House? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield just at that point?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CANNON. I will say to the gentleman, if he will yield, that I am not speaking of the merits of the amendment, but I do say that the amendment is germane and ought to be considered by the House because it is germane, and I would say the same thing whether I approved the amendment or disapproved of it. It gives freedom to the Committee of the Whole House, and if it denied, it is on the decision of the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I am glad that the gentleman at last recognizes that there should be some "freedom" in the House of Representatives. [Applause and cheers on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I will.

Mr. CANNON. As a Member of the House, and a colleague of the gentleman from Texas, and the former Speaker of this House, the gentleman from Illinois desires to state that he never at any time when he presided as Speaker of this House refused to enforce the rules of the House; that he always submitted to a majority of the House, even when he held in order as a question of high constitutional privilege a motion to vacate the chair and remove him as Speaker. The gentleman from Texas is not justified in his intimation, which received such vociferous applause upon that side of the House, that as Speaker I ever refused to submit to the will of the majority of the House, especially in view of the fact that the gentleman's side of the House some 12 months later on an important decision, which they pronounced as revolutionary, reversed themselves. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, it gives me great pleasure to accept on the part of the country the apology of the gentleman from Illinois, and the only regret I have is that he did not make it more than a year ago. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, there is an honest difference of opinion between the gentleman, Mr. CANNON, and myself as to the real construction of this rule, and I think we understand one another, and the House understands the interpretation that ought to be placed on the language.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Is it the contention of the gentleman that no articles can be added to this list by proper amendment, in the present parliamentary situation, unless a similar article be already enumerated in the bill?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Why, the gentleman has missed the mark entirely. Any germane amendment that he offers will be considered and held in order.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Will the gentleman be more specific? I think the whole controversy is as to what is germane.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Let me say to the gentleman that is quite correct, but I am not here for the purpose of teaching him parliamentary law, so that he may draw a germane amendment.

Mr. MANN. Oh, the gentleman could not if he were.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. The gentleman will perhaps answer the question as to whether or not any articles other than those enumerated are excluded from the bill under the rule of germaneness as now insisted upon by the gentleman.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I would say that any germane amendment in regard to the question, for illustration, of "leather" or any of the other 10 subjects specified in the bill would be germane, and if the gentleman can not think of a germane amendment, it is pretty certain that we have put everything on the free list that ought to be included while we are dealing with these enumerated subjects.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Well, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is disposed to seek a controversy. I am simply seeking an understanding of the gentleman's interpretation.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Oh, no; I am not seeking a controversy, I am seeking to bring the gentleman to a correct understanding——

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I have offered no amendment, but when I do it will be subject to objection and to the ruling of the Chair; but I desire to know the application of the gentleman's argument in the case. The gentleman contends, then, that the introduction of a different class of articles than those enumerated in the bill is now not germane. Is that right?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I contend it is not germane, because it is a different class, and not pertaining to the subject or specific articles enumerated.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. The gentleman does not contend that other articles of the same class and not enumerated in the bill would not be germane?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I would rather wait for the amendment. It may be that his amendment is germane, but this one certainly is not. Mr. Chairman, I do not know that there is anything else I care to add. Gentlemen complain about not allowing freedom of amendment and debate. We are giving opportunity to offer any germane amendment. When we considered the Dingley tariff bill in 1897, when I first entered this body, while you—the Republican Party—gave an ostensible opportunity to offer amendments, yet your rule denied us the real privilege of offering any amendment when the bill passed through this House. [Applause on the Democratic side.] We are offering them much greater freedom in the consideration of tariff legislation in this extraordinary session of Congress than they ever have accorded to us, and the country will and should understand it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard for just a few minutes on the point of order. Paragraph 3 of Rule XXI, which has been referred to, provides that no amendment shall be in order to any bill affecting revenue that is not germane to the subject matter in the bill. The other provision in reference to the germaneness of an item which is offered to be amended has no relation to the proposition now pending. The test of every rule is its working, and the test of this rule is its effect, not as to this particular amendment merely, but its effect in passing a revenue bill. Suppose, for instance, this were a general tariff bill. While I do not know that that side of the House will bring forward any general tariff bill, it is quite possible that at some time or other in the future, even with this rule remaining in force, if it be a good rule, a general tariff measure will be proposed to the House. Now, then, what would be the construction of the bill? Suppose the Payne tariff bill were now pending and this rule, which merely enunciates parliamentary law, were in force. What is the effect? Will it be contended that no new item could be offered to the Payne bill, if that were now pending and this rule were in force? Can nothing be added to a general tariff bill except what the committee has reported? For instance, I find in the Payne tariff law, item 680, "spunk."

Mr. LOBECK. We have it.

Mr. MANN. Suppose the Payne tariff law when presented to us contained no reference to "spunk." Is there no way by which that can be inserted in the free list? It is on the free list, but it relates to no other item in the bill. There is nothing else that it can be attached to as an amendment. Will it be said that it can not be put upon the free list because if it is not included it will be dutiable under the general clause providing for all items which are not enumerated? Is there a construction of this rule to be adopted which makes it impossible in the consideration of a tariff bill to put an item upon the free list which is not already contained in the bill?

If you can not put it upon the free list under every tariff law that ever has been passed, it will be dutiable under the general clause. Now, this rule must be tested by its effect upon a general tariff bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield for a question on that point?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Is it not a fact that the article to which the gentleman referred would be affected by the so-called basket clause, thus making it subject matter in the bill?

Mr. MANN. Why, not at all. The subject matter of the bill is the tariff, but there is no mention made of that thing in the bill. That is what I am claiming.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the gentleman will pardon me, I think he will agree that there is. The basket clause, if I recall it, is something like this, that if certain duties upon articles are not specifically provided for in the bill, and the article is not specifically enumerated, it is embraced in the basket clause, and the bill would affect that article, and that would be subject matter in the bill.

Mr. MANN. Now, I have the gentleman exactly where I wanted to get some one on that side of the House. Suppose there is no basket clause in the bill, then you can not insert an item in the bill under the ruling, and without the item in the bill you can not import it into the United States. That is the logic of the situation. There is no provision made. It can not get by the customhouse, because there is no provision that it shall come in free, and if you leave out the basket clause there is no way by which you can hang the amendment to the bill, a thing contended for on that side of the House.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman is in error about the possibility of its coming into the country.

Mr. MANN. I am not in error at all. Every item that comes through the customhouse must pass in in some way under a provision of law.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Not necessarily.

Mr. MANN. Absolutely necessarily.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Not necessarily, at all.

Mr. MANN. Then you would need——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Why, if there were no law fixing duties on imports and declaring that some should be admitted free of duty, does the gentleman think that because of that situation imports could not be brought into the United States? That is the logic of his argument.

Mr. MANN. I do, most decidedly. That will be the result of such a ruling. The amendment which I offered relates to the subject matter in the bill. What is the subject matter in the bill? It is to place certain articles upon the free list. That is what it means. It is not for the Chair to determine whether glass is related to wire, or whether window glass is related to agricultural implements. It is not for the Chair to determine whether an item of an amendment is related to some other item in the bill. That is requiring altogether too much information on the part of the Chair. The Chair can only determine the scope of a bill, and, if the amendment is germane to the scope of the bill, then it is germane to the subject matter in the bill. And any other ruling will land the Chair in very great difficulties.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I ask the indulgence of the committee and the Chair for a moment or two upon this point of order. I think if we would play less politics and endeavor to correctly interpret our rules we would perhaps get along better. I asked the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] one or two very courteous questions, and he seemed to think it the occasion of a political controversy.

Now, it seems to me we are driven to one of two interpretations of this rule. It is not a new rule, except in its form. It provides that in a specific class of cases, as to revenue bills, amendments that are offered must be germane to the subject matter of the bill. What is the subject matter of the bill? Either the subject matter is the creation of a free list or else its subject matter is in the particular articles here enumerated. If it is the particular articles herein enumerated, it is not subject to any amendment. If the general subject is the creation or defining of a free-list bill, then certainly the offering of any other articles to be placed on the free list is germane to the subject matter of the bill.

And I call the gentleman's attention, and the Chair's attention, to the precedents upon this general subject. If this amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois were offered to any particular paragraph of the bill it would not be germane to that paragraph, and could, therefore, be objected to as not germane to the paragraph. My contention is that a new paragraph, which this amounts to, which is germane to the general subject matter of the bill and reciting certain other articles which may be put upon the free list, is germane to the subject matter of the bill. And I call the Chair's attention to a few of the precedents upon this subject. They are on page 391 of the old manual of the rules:

A general subject may be amended by specific propositions of the same class. Thus the following have been held to be germane: To a bill admitting several Territories into the Union, an amendment adding another Territory (V, 5838); to a bill providing for the construction of buildings in each of two cities, an amendment providing for similar buildings in several other cities (V, 5840); to a resolution embodying two distinct phases of international relationship, an amendment embodying a third (V, 5839).

I call the attention of the Chair to the first decision there cited in Hinds' Precedents, volume 5, section 5838:

To a bill admitting several Territories into the Union an amendment adding another Territory is germane. On May 8, 1902, the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union was considering the bill (H. R. 12543) providing for the admission into the Union of the Territories of Oklahoma, Arizona, and New Mexico.

Mr. Thomas C. McRae, of Arkansas, proposed an amendment providing for the addition of the Indian Territory to Oklahoma.

Mr. JAMES T. LLOYD, of Missouri, raised the question of order that the proposed amendment was not germane.

After debate the Chairman held:

The Chair is ready to rule. If this were a bill for the admission of Oklahoma Territory alone as a State, there would be no doubt as to the position taken by the gentleman from Missouri being correct. An amendment to admit some other Territory as a State would not be in order. But this is a general bill, covering three different Territories, and an amendment, as suggested by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], to admit Alaska as a State would be in order on this bill—which, by the way, seems to have been our friend, the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means. He seems to have been on the other side of the proposition at that time.

For instance, a private claim bill for the allowance of a single claim would not be subject to an amendment allowing some other claim, but a general claims bill, such as often comes before this House, can be amended by adding another claim. So with public building bills. A bill to erect a public building at Birmingham, Ala., could not be amended by a proposition to erect a public building at Indianapolis, Ind.; but a bill providing for a number of public buildings could be amended by adding another public building. One is a general bill, the other is a bill for a single object; and, as the Chair said, if this were a bill to admit Oklahoma alone as a State, this amendment would not be in order. On the other hand, it is a general bill proposing to admit three Territories as States.

In the Thirty-fourth Congress a decision was made by the Speaker that covers this point clearly. On July 17, 1856, Mr. Elihu B. Washburne, of Illinois, reported from the Committee on Commerce a resolution of the Senate for enlarging the customhouse and post office and courthouse at Milwaukee, Wis., and at Detroit, Mich., and for the construction of a public building for the same purpose at Dubuque, Iowa, with an amendment providing for some public buildings at Toledo, Ohio; Ogdensburg, N. Y.; Ellsworth, Me.; Chicago, Ill.; Nashville, Tenn.; and other points.

Mr. James L. Orr, of South Carolina, made the point of order that the amendment was not germane to the original resolution, inasmuch as it provided for the construction and enlargement of public buildings in different cities and States from those mentioned in the resolution to which the amendment was offered. The Speaker overruled the point of order. There was the exact question. There was a public-building bill providing for two or more buildings. An amendment was offered to add another building in another State.

The point of order was made, and the Speaker of the House, Nathaniel P. Banks, jr., of Massachusetts, overruled the point of order. There is no doubt, in the opinion of the Chair, that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. McRae] is in order on this bill, this being a general bill for the admission of Territories. The Chair therefore overrules the point of order.

Mr. Chairman, this particular bill, now before the consideration of the committee and the Chair, is a much more general bill than a bill simply providing for the admission into the Union of three specific Territories, cited by name, and it does not lose its general character from the fact that it is made up of several paragraphs and covers many subjects. On the contrary, its general character is emphasized. And I maintain, Mr. Chairman, that the precedents ought not to be departed from now, even under stress of the political exigencies of the situation. [Applause on the Republican side and cries of "Rule!" "Rule!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to have the attention of the committee. The question presented here is one of very great importance.

During the progress of the general debate suggestions were made by different speakers that they proposed to offer amendments to the pending bill, putting different articles on the free list—rice, sugar, peanuts, wool, and other commodities. The Chair could not help but observe the suggestions, and knowing that later on the question would come up for consideration, felt it his duty to investigate the rule with reference to amendments, as it would be incumbent upon him to determine whether or not these and other amendments that might be suggested would be relevant and germane to the pending bill. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] says that the Chairman can defy the will of the majority by a ruling. The Chair does not know that the gentleman from Illinois meant that, but it is hardly necessary for the Chair to remind the committee that the majority of this committee can control this situation. It can determine whether or not this amendment or other related amendments are relevant or not, and if the Chair errs, can overrule the Chair.

The Chair had nothing to do with formulating the rule. He voted for it, along with other Members of the majority, when the rules were adopted by the House. At that time his attention was not called to it. He had no occasion to consider its significance, but he has given it some consideration in the last day or two, and desires to submit, with some care, his opinion on the rule and its application to the question pending before the committee, because if this amendment is in order under the rule then amendments placing on the free list all the articles now on the dutiable list, one by one or schedule by schedule, would be in order.

The point of order is made by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] that this amendment is not germane to the subject matter in the bill. Gentlemen in discussing this question seem to overlook the significance of the language of the rule, and the attention of the committee is called to section 3 of Rule XXI, as follows:

No amendment shall be in order to any bill affecting the revenue which is not germane to the subject matter in the bill; nor shall any amendment to any item of such bill be in order which does not directly relate to the item to which the amendment is proposed.

This is a new section of Rule XXI and was adopted for the first time as a part of the rules of the House of Representatives of the Sixty-second Congress, and, so far as the Chair knows, it has never been construed.

In construing this rule it may be well to consider the rule relating to germaneness that has been in force for over 90 years.

Section 7 of Rule XVI provides that—

No motion or proposition on a subject different from that under consideration shall be admitted under color of amendment.

This rule was adopted in 1789 and amended in 1822, and has been in force ever since and has often been construed.

On March 26, 1897, the tariff bill was under consideration in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the Clerk had read the first paragraph, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That on and after the 1st day of May, 1897, unless otherwise specially provided for in this act, there shall be levied, collected, and paid upon all articles imported from foreign countries or withdrawn for consumption, and mentioned in the schedules herein contained, the rates of duty which are by the schedules and paragraphs respectively prescribed, namely.

To this Mr. Alexander M. Dockery, of Missouri, proposed this amendment:

Provided, That when it is shown to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Treasury that such articles are manufactured, controlled, or produced in the United States by a trust or trusts, the importation of such articles from foreign countries shall be free of duty until such manufacture, control, or production shall have ceased, in the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. Nelson Dingley, of Maine, made a point of order against the amendment.

The Chairman ruled as follows:

The pending bill is a bill to provide revenue for the Government and to encourage the industries of the United States.

Section 2 of the bill, on page 123, provides that after the 1st day of May the articles thereafter enumerated, when imported, shall be exempt from duty.

To the first paragraph the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. Dockery, offers an amendment providing that under certain conditions all articles upon the dutiable list shall be transferred to the free list. To that amendment the gentleman from Maine, Mr. Dingley, raises the point of order that it is not in order at that point of the bill. The gentleman from Texas, Mr. BAILEY, cites a decision of the then Speaker, the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. Carlisle, acting as Speaker pro tempore. The decision, as shown by the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, does not carry out the statement upon page 271 of the Digest. That decision held that any amendment must be germane to the general provision of the bill. It did not hold that being germane to the provisions of a bill was permissible at any point. It did hold that the amendment then presented to the bill at the point was admissible.

The question before the Chair here and now is not whether the committee is liable to reach page 123 of the bill. The Chair can not take into consideration that probability, as suggested by the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. Dockery, but must rule upon the question as it is now presented, to wit, Is the amendment presented germane to this provision? The Chair holds that the amendment is not germane, and therefore sustains the point of order.

On March 17, 1880, the House was considering a bill making appropriations to supply certain deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes, among which were deficiency appropriations for the Public Printing Office. Mr. Singleton, of Mississippi, offered an amendment for the purpose of repealing the law making the office of Public Printer an appointive office by the President and making the Public Printer an elective officer of the House of Representatives. Mr. McMahon, of Ohio, made the point of order against the amendment, on the ground, among others, that it was not germane to the subject matter of the bill. Mr. John G. Carlisle, of Kentucky, sustained the point of order in the following learned and exhaustive opinion, which covers this question. The Chair thinks it would be well at this point to have that opinion read, and will ask the Clerk to read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

The amendment submitted by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Singleton], under instructions from the Committee on Printing, is objected to upon two grounds: First, that it is not germane to the subject matter of the bill under consideration, and, secondly, that it is, in substance, the same as a bill heretofore reported by the Committee on Printing and now pending before the House.

Notice of this amendment was given several days since, and during the general debate in the Committee of the Whole the Chair was advised that a point of order would be raised against it; so that a reasonable opportunity has been afforded to examine the subject, and the Chair will now state the conclusions at which he has arrived.

In the absence of an express rule the amendment would not be liable to a point of order upon the ground that it was inconsistent with or not germane to the subject under consideration, for, according to the common parliamentary law of this country and of England, a legislative assembly might by an amendment, in the ordinary form or in the form of a substitute, change the entire character of any bill or other proposition pending. It might entirely displace the original subject under consideration and in its stead adopt one wholly foreign to it, both in form and in substance.

But ever since the 4th of March, 1789, this House has had a rule which changed the common parliamentary law in this respect, at least as to substitutes, and ever since 1822 as to amendments in any form. The Congress of the Confederation in 1781 adopted a rule in the following words:

"No new motion or proposition shall be admitted under color of amendment as a substitute for a question or proposition under debate until it is postponed or disagreed to."

The House of Representatives of the First Congress, on the 4th of March, 1789, adopted the following rule upon this subject:

"No new motion or proposition shall be admitted under color of amendment as a substitute for the motion or proposition under debate."

It will be observed that each of these rules admitted amendments introducing new motions or propositions if they were not offered as substitutes for the motion or proposition under debate. But in March, 1822, the House changed the rule of 1789 so as to make it read as follows:

"No motion or proposition on a subject different from that under consideration shall be admitted under color of amendment."

And in this form the rule has stood ever since, and now constitutes a part of the seventh clause of Rule XVI in the recent revision. The rule does not prohibit a committee reporting a bill from embracing in it as many different subjects as it may choose; but after the bill has been reported to the House no different subject can be introduced into it by amendment, whether as a substitute or otherwise.

When therefore it is objected that a proposed amendment is not in order because it is not germane, the meaning of the objection is simply that it (the proposed amendment) is a motion or proposition on a subject different from that under consideration. This is the test of admissibility prescribed by the express language of the rule; and if the Chair, upon an examination of the bill under consideration and the proposed amendment, shall be of the opinion that they do not relate to the same subject, he is bound to sustain the objection and exclude the amendment, subject, of course, to the revisory power of the Committee of the Whole on appeal.

It is not always easy to determine whether or not a proposed amendment relates to a subject different from that under consideration, within the meaning of the rule; and it is especially difficult to do so when, as in the present instance, the amendment may, by reason of the terms it employs, appear to have a remote relation to the original subject.

The subject to which the bill now under consideration relates is very clearly set forth in its title. It is "A bill making appropriations to supply certain deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes." The appropriations "for other purposes" contained in the bill do not relate at all to any of the subjects embraced in the amendment and therefore need not be noticed. The words "for other purposes" are used here, as they usually are, to embrace subjects outside of the main subjects to which the bill relates and which are reported by the committee itself.

The bill relates to no other subjects than appropriations of money for the purpose stated, "to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government." One of the deficiencies which the bill provides for is the Government Printing Office. But the bill carefully enumerates the items for which the appropriation is to be made, and the salary of the Public Printer is not among them.

The proposed amendment has no relation to the appropriation of money for any purpose. It neither increases nor diminishes the amount proposed to be appropriated by the bill, nor does it in any manner affect the expenditure of the money proposed to be appropriated by the bill. The salary of the Public Printer for the current fiscal year has already been provided for in full, and it does not appear that there is any deficiency on that account.

The amendment relates solely to the method of choosing a Public Printer, to the nature of the duties to be performed by him, and to the amount of his salary. As already stated, the original bill embraces none of these matters, and consequently none of these subjects are now under consideration. It seems quite clear, therefore, that the proposed amendment, if admitted, would introduce for consideration one or more new subjects, and is for that reason prohibited by the express language of the rule.

Under the rule as it stood prior to 1822 the amendment, although on a subject different from that under consideration, would be in order, for it is not offered as a substitute for the bill or for the clause under consideration. But, as already noted, the prohibition applies now as well to ordinary amendments as to substitutes.

Since the adoption of the rule in its present form there have been several decisions under it; and so far as the Chair has been able to discover, in every instance where an amendment proposed to introduce an entirely new subject it has been excluded. The Chair refers to the Journal of the House, Twenty-seventh Congress, first session, page 223, for a decision by Mr. Speaker White; Journal of the House, Thirtieth Congress, first session, page 737, a decision by Mr. Speaker Winthrop; Journal of the House, Thirtieth Congress, second session, page 645, Speaker Winthrop overruled; Journal of the House, Thirty-first Congress, first session, pages 1509 and 1510, a decision by Mr. Speaker Cobb.

Having disposed of the point of order upon the first ground presented, it is unnecessary to express an opinion upon the second ground, and the Chair prefers not to do so.

The fourth clause of Rule XXI provides that "no bill or resolution shall at any time be amended by annexing thereto or incorporating therewith the substance of any other bill or resolution pending before the House." Where a proposed amendment differs in any respect from a bill or resolution pending before the House, it will always be more or less difficult to determine whether or not they are substantially the same; and the Chair thinks he ought not to attempt to decide such a question unless it is absolutely necessary to do so.

The point of order is sustained, and the amendment is excluded.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the later practice an amendment should be germane to the particular paragraph or section to which it is offered (Hinds' Precedents, vol. 5, 5811–5820), and an amendment inserting an additional section should be germane to the portion of the bill to which it is offered. (Hinds' Precedents, vol. 5, 5822.)

In determining whether or not an amendment is germane, rulings have been made at various times as follows: To a bill proposing admission of one Territory into the Union an amendment for admission of another Territory was held not to be germane (Hinds' Precedents, vol. 5, 5826–5829); to a bill for the relief of an individual, an amendment proposing similar relief for another was held not to be germane (Hinds' Precedents, vol. 5, 5826–5829); to a bill providing for the extermination of the cotton-boll weevil, an amendment including the gypsy moth was held by Mr. CANNON, late Speaker of the House, not to be germane to a bill relating to commerce between the States; an amendment relating to commerce between the States was held not to be germane to an amendment relating to commerce within the several States. (Hinds' Precedents, vol. 5, 5841.)

Many other decisions might be cited construing section 7, Rule XVI, but the above will suffice. To say the least of it, it admits of serious doubt whether or not the proposed amendment is in order under said section 7, Rule XVI.

But the rule here invoked against the amendment goes further than section 7 of Rule XVI. It expressly provides, first, that no amendment to any bill affecting the revenue (and this bill is of that character) shall be in order which is not germane to the subject matter in the bill; and, second, nor shall any amendment to any item of such bill be in order which does not directly relate to the item to which the amendment is proposed. This rule and the provision of Rule XVI referred to should be construed together. It is clear to the mind of the Chair that this rule was intended to further limit the right of amendment, and to make it clear that to be germane the amendment should relate to the subject matter in the bill, and to the particular item in this bill, ought to be amended.

This is a bill entitled:

A bill to place on the free list agricultural implements, cotton bagging, cotton ties, leather, boots and shoes, fence wire, meats, cereals, flour, bread, timber, lumber, sewing machines, salt, and other articles.

The first clause following the enacting clause provides:

That from and after the day following the passage of this act the following articles shall be exempt from duty when imported into the United States.

While the bill relates to the free list, does the amendment proposing to put glass on the free list in any proper sense relate to the subject matter in the bill, or to any item in the bill?

If under section 7, of Rule XVI, an amendment placing certain articles on the free list is not germane to that portion of the bill which provides for the imposition of duties; and if an amendment legislating in relation to the selection of a Public Printer is not germane to a bill making deficiency appropriations for the Government Printing Office; and if an amendment should be germane to the particular paragraph or section to which it is offered; and if one individual proposition may not be amended by another individual proposition even though the two belong to the same class, thus, to a bill proposing the admission of one Territory into the Union, an amendment providing for the admission of another Territory; to a bill for the relief of one individual, an amendment proposing similar relief for another; or to a provision for the extermination of the cotton-boll weevil, an amendment including the gypsy moth; or to a bill relating to commerce between the States, an amendment relating to commerce within the several States, as seems to have been uniformly held, does it not seem quite plain that the proposed amendment is not in order under the rules here invoked, which was framed for application to revenue bills—to which class the pending bill, H. R. 4413, belongs.

To which part of the subject matter in the bill, or to what item in the bill is the amendment germane? If an amendment placing glass on the free list is germane, why not any schedule or part of a schedule in the Payne tariff law, without reference to whether it is related in a parlimentary sense to the subject matter of the bill or not. In the opinion of the Chair the amendment is not germane to the subject matter in the bill or to any item in the bill. Therefore the point of order made by the gentleman from Alabama is sustained. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I respectfully appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois appeals from the decision of the Chair. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the decision of the committee?

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. MANN. I demand tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Tellers were ordered.

Mr. DALZELL and Mr. UNDERWOOD took their places as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 160, noes 101.

So the decision of the Chair stood as the decision of the committee.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting, after line 5, page 1, as a new paragraph, the following:

"Medicinal preparations, not specially provided for."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make the same point of order as to the last amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer a further amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers a further amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting, after line 5, page 1, as a new paragraph, the following:

"White lead, and white pigment containing lead, dry or in pulp, or ground or mixed with oil."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make the same point of order for the same reason.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, just a moment on the point of order. This bill proposes to put agricultural implements upon the free list. The Chair must take notice, I think, as long as he is to determine whether amendments relate to items in the bill, of the fact that agricultural implements are painted and have to be painted. Paint must be used in connection with the production and manufacture of agricultural implements. Now, it is proposed to put agricultural implements on the free list and leave a tariff on white lead, which is the basis of paint. I insist that the proposition to put white lead upon the free list is germane to a bill which provides for putting painted articles upon the free list. Will it be said that we put a tariff upon the paint that covers the articles, but that we let in the articles, when they are painted, free, and thereby make a discrimination against our manufacturers? Therefore I insist that the amendment is germane to the substance of the bill to which I have referred.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] makes the point of order that the amendment is not germane to the subject matter in the bill. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting after line 5, page 1, as a new paragraph, the following:

"Common yellow, brown, or gray earthenware, plain, embossed, or salt-glazed common stoneware, all the foregoing not decorated in any manner."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make the same point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama makes the point of order against the amendment. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] desire to be heard?

Mr. MANN. I do not desire to be heard on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MANN. I offer another amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting after line 5, page 1, as a new paragraph, the following:

"Clays or earths, unwrought or unmanufactured, not specially provided for by law; china clay or kaolin; asphaltum and bitumen; fuller's earth, unwrought and unmanufactured."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane to the item in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer a further amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers a further amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 1, after line 5, by inserting as a new paragraph the following:

"Fluorspar."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I make a point of order, Mr. Chairman, against that.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard on the point of order.

Fluorspar is a flux used in the production and manufacture of steel. It is proposed in this bill to place a large number of steel articles on the free list, but to leave a tariff upon fluorspar. It might, therefore, be interesting in this connection to call attention to the history of the introduction of fluorspar into the Payne law.

Fluorspar is produced in the United States largely in the State of Illinois, in the district formerly represented by my colleague from Illinois Mr. Chapman, and in the State of Kentucky, in the district then and now represented by the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES], who is, possibly, likely to leave us for another body. When the Payne law was first reported to the House it carried crude fluorspar at 50 cents a ton. Under the benign influence of the gentleman from Illinois, my colleague Mr. Chapman, and at least not hindered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES], the House raised the duty to $1.50 a ton, and in conference or in the Senate the duty was raised to $3 a ton.

No duty had ever been put upon fluorspar before. It was upon the free list under the Dingley law. It was raised here in the House from 50 cents a ton, the first proposition, to $1.50 and then finally to $3 a ton. It was so easy that if it had gone through another process, manipulated possibly by gentlemen on both sides of the aisle, it would undoubtedly have come out at a much higher rate.

Now, fluorspar is an article necessary in the production of steel. You propose to put steel articles upon the free list. Is it not in order at the same time to put upon the free list an article necessary for the production of steel? Would it not be in order, when you put wire on the free list, to put iron ore on the free list, and to put pig iron on the free list? If it is in order to put these on the free list, is it not in order to put the articles which go into their manufacture on the free list? Are we to hold that no amendment can be offered which does relate to an item in the bill?

We have first had a ruling that no amendment can be offered which takes anything out of the bill and puts it on the dutiable list. Then we have had a ruling that no amendment is in order that takes any item out of the dutiable list and puts it on the free list, not germane to some item in the bill. But this does relate to every iron and steel product affected by the bill. I insist, Mr. Chairman, that it is germane to the subject matter in the bill, and therefore in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order made by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] is sustained.

Mr. MANN. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have a further amendment to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] offers a further amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, by inserting after line 5, page 1, as a new paragraph, the following:

"Sponges, not specially provided for by law."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make the same point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer a further amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] offers a further amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting after line 5, page 1, as a new paragraph, the following:

"Paris green and London purple."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, to that I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer a further amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting after line 5, page 1, as a new paragraph, the following:

"Drugs, such as barks, beans, berries, balsams, buds, bulbs, bulbous roots, excrescences, fruits, flowers, dried fibers, dried insects, grains, gums, gum resin, herbs, leaves, lichens, mosses, nuts, nutgalls, roots, stems, spices, vegetables, seeds (aromatic, not garden seeds), seeds of morbid growth, weeds, and woods used expressly for dyeing or tanning; any of the foregoing which are natural and uncompounded drugs and not edible and not specially provided for by law, though the same are advanced in value or condition by process or treatment beyond that essential to the proper packing of the drugs and the prevention of decay or deterioration pending manufacture: Provided, That no article containing alcohol, or in the preparation of which alcohol is used, shall be classified for duty under this paragraph."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. MANN. I offer a further amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 1, by inserting after line 5, as a new paragraph, the following:

"Blue vitriol or sulphate of copper."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I make a point of order against that.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. MANN. I offer a further amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, by inserting after line 5, page 1, as a new paragraph, the following:

"Borax, borates of lime, soda, and other borate material not otherwise specially provided for by law."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. MANN. I offer a further amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, by inserting after line 5, page 1, as a new paragraph, the following:

"Castor oil."

[Laughter.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against that amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I insist that castor oil ought to be put on the free list in order to aid the gentlemen on the other side of the House to slip this bill through. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. MANN. I offer a further amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, by inserting after line 5, page 1, as a new paragraph, the following:

"Castile soap, medicinal or medicated soaps, and all other soaps not specially provided for by law."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. MANN. I offer a further amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, by inserting after line 5, page 1, as a new paragraph, the following:

"Spectacles, eyeglasses, and goggles, and frames for the same, or parts thereof, finished or unfinished."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I make the point of order against that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. MANN. I offer the amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 1, after line 5, by inserting as a new paragraph, the following:

"Lense and lense glass for the use of the Lighthouse Service."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I make the point of order against that paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 1, line 5, by adding as a separate paragraph the following:

"Fertilizers of all kinds."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against that.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 1 strike out lines 3, 4, and 5 and insert in lieu thereof the following: "That on and after the date"——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against that, that the paragraph which it is sought to amend has been passed.

Mr. HILL. Not at all. We are amending it now.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The amendment seeks to amend the first paragraph of the bill, and a number of amendments have been offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], commencing after line 5, and inserting new paragraphs.

Mr. HILL. The second paragraph has not been read; not a word of it.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, perhaps the gentleman from Alabama wants to do that as a precedent. Let him proceed; it is in line with the other precedents of this afternoon.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, the first paragraph is what the gentleman's amendment relates to.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I do not think the gentleman will object to the amendment if he waits to hear it read.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, if it is out of order it is my duty to make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 1, strike out lines 3, 4, and 5 and insert in lieu thereof the following——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that it is to strike out lines 3, 4, and 5, and the paragraph which it seeks to amend has been passed.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is inclined to the opinion that the gentleman from Connecticut is in order. It is true that amendments have been offered to insert new sections by way of amendment following the word "date," in line 5. The Clerk will read the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 1 strike out lines 3, 4, and 5 and insert in lieu thereof the following: "That on and after the day following the passage of this act the articles mentioned in the following paragraphs shall, when imported from any foreign country into the United States, or into any of its possessions (except the Philippine Islands and the islands of Guam and Tutuila), be exempt from duty."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that it is not germane.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, all I desire to do by this amendment is to make this law applicable to Porto Rico and put us all on the same basis. As the bill now reads we will have one tariff for continental United States and another tariff for the United States possessions, and it seems to me as though that ought not be done.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Plows, tooth and disk harrows, headers, harvesters, reapers, agricultural drills and planters, mowers, horserakes, cultivators, threshing machines and cotton gins, farm wagons and farm carts, and all other agricultural implements of any kind and description, whether specifically mentioned herein or not, whether in whole or in parts, including repair parts.

Mr. HANNA. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add, after the word "machines," on line 8 of page 1 of the printed bill, the following:

"Portable engines, with boilers in combination; horsepower and traction engines for farm purposes; hay loaders, potato diggers, fodder or feed cutters, grain crushers, fanning mills, hay tedders, farm or field rollers, manure spreaders, weeders, and windmills, and finished parts thereof imported for repair of the foregoing."

Mr. HANNA. Mr. Chairman, in reference to these items, in the reciprocity bill which passed the House a short time since a duty was left upon them of 20 per cent ad valorem. This amendment proposes to put threshing engines and other farm machinery on the free list. The largest item in the purchase of a threshing outfit is the engine that runs it, the traction engine. The engines should go on the free list just as much as the threshing machine itself, and the same is true as to windmills and other farm machinery, and there is no reason why this amendment ought not to prevail.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, there is no reason why the gentleman's amendment should not prevail except that it is already in the language of the bill. The bill provides for putting plows and tooth and disk harrows and other agricultural implements, threshing machines and cotton gins on the free list, and then goes on and says—and all other agricultural implements of any kind and description, whether specifically mentioned herein or not, whether in whole or in parts, including repair parts.

Mr. HANNA. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman has had time, and if he will allow me——

Mr. HANNA. Just one question. Do I understand the gentleman that the words "agricultural implements" apply to threshing machines and traction engines, or to rakes, hoes, and small tools of that kind?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Agricultural implements are the implements which the farmer uses.

Mr. HANNA. Threshing engines, windmills, and large farm machinery are not generally considered as agricultural implements.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think it is included in the language of the bill, and the amendment of the gentleman ought to be voted down.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the ayes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. HANNA) there were—ayes 77, noes 124.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "gins," in line 8, page 1, insert the following:

"Provided, That the above-named articles, if imported from a country which lays an import duty on like articles imported from the United States, shall be subject to a duty of 15 per cent ad valorem."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that is not in order according to paragraph 3 of Rule XXI, which says:

Nor shall any amendment to any item of such bill be in order which does not directly relate to the item to which the amendment is proposed.

This item is the item enumerating the articles contained in the bill. The proposition of the gentleman would apply properly, if in order at all, to section 1 and not to this section of the bill.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Before the Chair rules upon the point of order, I desire to ask whether it will be in order to move to strike out all the words, beginning in line 6 and ending after the word "gins," in line 8?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it would be in order to strike them out.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Then I desire to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that the precise object to be accomplished by the amendment which I have offered and to which the gentleman from Alabama makes the point of order, would be accomplished by striking out those words. The situation is simply this, that to-day, under existing law, these enumerated articles—plows, and so forth—are upon the free list from any country which does not impose a duty against us. The same object could be accomplished as that in my amendment by striking out those words, because that would then leave the law as it exists. However, I have preferred to offer my amendment by way of a proviso which provides that these articles shall remain as they are on the free list whenever imported from a country which does not place a duty against similar articles imported from the United States and will leave the existing duty of 15 per cent on those articles when imported from a country that maintains a duty against us. Now, if the contention of the gentleman from Alabama is correct, that my amendment is not germane, he is put in the attitude of saying that it is not germane to restore the existing law upon a paragraph which changes existing law. I therefore suggest that the Chair must rule my amendment in order if he proposes, as he says, to rule the proposition to strike out those words in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state, in the opinion of the Chair, the motion to strike out is in order, but the effect of that motion, if it prevails, is not a matter of concern to the Chair, but this is coupled with another proposition which has fully been covered, the Chair thinks, by the rulings of the Chair before.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Do I understand that the Chair rules that my amendment, as read, is not in order because it is not germane?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair holds it is not in order; that it is not germane to the subject matter of the bill or the items under consideration.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Then the Chair rules it is germane to accomplish the same object in one way and not germane to accomplish that same object in another way?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair rules, and it is for the House to construe the ruling as it chooses.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Then, Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the words beginning, in line 6, with the word "plows" and ending after the word "gins," on line 8.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 6, strike out the word "plows" and down to and including the word "gins," on line 8.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 1, line 8, by inserting after the word "gins" the following:
"Grindstones, finished or unfinished."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that it is not germane to the paragraph in the bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard on the point of order. We get to the point now where, under the rulings of the Chair, he must rule whether a grindstone is any form of an agricultural implement. Undoubtedly the Chair is familiar with the fact that grindstones are used on every farm and that agriculture can proceed but a little ways without the use of a grindstone. What does the bill do? It proposes to put on the free list plows, tooth and disk harrows, mowers, horserakes, cultivators, threshing machines, cotton gins, and all other agricultural implements. Do I understand from this that a cotton gin is an agricultural implement but that a grindstone is not? Do I understand that a threshing machine is an agricultural implement, but that a grindstone is not?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I would ask the gentleman if it is not a fact that, if a grindstone is not an agricultural implement, it does not properly belong in this section, and if it is an agricultural implement, it is already included.

Mr. MANN. I have never known the gentleman to ask a material question since I have been in the House.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. The gentleman has never yet given a respectful answer to any man who has put him apparently in the hole. The gentleman can not get in line with courtesy on this floor, and to get out of a corner he always uses insulting words. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. The gentleman in referring to me describes himself. I have often noticed another thing. I shall not be deterred by the ignorant applause on that side of the House, Mr. Chairman. I notice, as a rule, as I look at the gentlemen who make the most noise, that they are the ones who, as a rule, have the least knowledge.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. The gentleman from Illinois makes more noise than any 10 men on the floor.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I shall not be driven into any form of anger by anything that any of the gentlemen say on that side of the House, and it will be useless for the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD] or anyone else on that side of the House to attempt to disturb my equanimity, because I shall preserve it.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. We are not trying to disturb his equanimity.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is trying his best to be offensive; but, knowing the gentleman, nothing he can say will be offensive to me.

Now, what is the proposition? Certain things are named in the bill specifically. Is an agricultural drill an agricultural implement? It is named in the bill.

There is general language in the bill, but specific language as to agricultural drills. Is it in order to name agricultural drills in the bill, but not name any other agricultural implement in the bill? If it is in order to name one agricultural implement in the bill, then it is a germane amendment to name any other specific agricultural implement, and I undertake to say that even the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD] could learn and understand that [cries of "No, no!" on the Republican side], although that may be a strain on my imagination.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair agrees with the gentleman, so far as he should take notice of his opinion, that grindstones are implements used on a farm, but the Chair will not undertake to decide. The Chair is of opinion that all well-regulated farms have grindstones on them [applause on the Republican side], but it is for the House to determine whether or not grindstones are already provided for in this bill; and if not, whether it ought to include them with other farm implements. The point of order is overruled.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I wish to read a statement from a letter which I think will throw some light upon this controversy.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order and call attention to the fact that no paper can be read in this House without unanimous consent.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, then, I will send it to the Clerk's desk and have it read by the Clerk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York sends a letter to the Clerk's desk and asks to have it read.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I call attention to the fact that it can only be read by unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the gentleman can have it read in his own time.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Only by unanimous consent can the gentleman have it read in his own time.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is overruled, if that is what the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] intends.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I wish to make a statement in regard to some information which has come to me from a very distinguished Republican from the city of New York. [Laughter on the Democratic side.] He states in a communication to me something about as follows; as nearly as I can recall the exact language I shall give it to the House:

So far your party seems to be making an intelligent use of its opportunity, although some of the debate has struck me as being absolutely puerile. Representative MANN, for instance, does not seem to know the difference between an agricultural implement and an implement used by agriculturists in common with a number of other people. For this purpose a plow is an agricultural implement and a spade is not.

[Applause and laughter on the Democratic side.]

As this statement is written by a distinguished Republican [cries of "Name him!"], I simply wish to commend it to the Republicans who desire to amend this bill by including additional implements as agricultural implements, since inasmuch as I am neither a farmer nor an agriculturist nor a horticulturist, I am unable to say——

Mr. MANN. Then why did you "butt in"? [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. FITZGERALD (continuing). Whether these instruments are strictly agricultural implements. But to the Republicans who have recently taken such great delight in attempting to help the farmers of this country, I am sure this statement will be of considerable benefit. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, what the gentleman has said is very interesting, especially taken in connection with this rule—

The reading of papers other than the one on which the vote is about to be taken is usually permitted without question, and the Member in debate usually reads or has read such papers as he pleases, but this privilege is subject to the authority of the House if another Member objects.

And when the Chair overruled my point of order, he ruled as well as he has ruled all day. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts may not entertain a very good opinion of the rulings of the Chair, but the admiration may be mutual. [Laughter.]

The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out the word "farm" in lines 8 and 9 on page 1, and the word "agricultural" in line 9, page 1.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. How will the proposition read with the amendment, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, may we have that amendment reported again, so that we can hear it?

The Clerk again reported the amendment.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. Now, Mr. Chairman, my object in offering this amendment is not to indicate any sympathy whatever with this measure, but inasmuch as I believe it to be the only piece of out-and-out class legislation that I have seen presented in this House for the last six or seven years, I deem it to be the duty of every Member of this House to direct attention to it. I believe this legislation, if it is to become a law, should be as general as possible in its terms and affect all classes of people in this country alike.

It seems to me that a measure that attempts to draw a line so distinctly between two classes of people in this country as this does is repugnant to the spirit that has animated the American people from the foundation of this country to the present hour. I regret to see the party that has so long proclaimed itself the real friend of the people, the friend of the masses, indulging at this early stage of this extraordinary session in the practice of drawing a distinct line between two classes of people in this country.

The effect of my amendment is to strike out the word "farm," connected with and preceding the word "wagon." I can not see why a duty should be imposed upon a wagon used by a man who toils upon a farm when a wagon is made free to the man who toils in the city, and the converse of that proposition is likewise true.

If the man on the farm is to have his wagon admitted to this country free of duty, then the man who hauls rags and refuse through the city streets and thereby ekes out a livelihood is entitled to the admission of his vehicle free of duty at the same time. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. I decline to yield, as my time is too limited. The man who hauls express packages through the streets of our crowded cities, and has, perchance, dependent upon him as large a family of little children as the man upon the farm, is entitled to the same consideration at the hands of the American Congress, even if he is not getting it at the hands of the party that now dominates this House. The man who hauls coal to the door of the man in the city is entitled to the same consideration as the man who hauls supplies from the farm. And let me put this concrete proposition to the gentleman from Alabama: What difference is there between the man who brings a load of produce from a farm 10 miles from the city and peddles it through the streets and the man who goes to the railroad station, purchases his farm supplies from the producer, piles them on his wagon, and conducts his business on the highway side by side with the man from the farm? They are both engaged in selling the same articles in the same city on the same day, on the same street, and why the discrimination that has been introduced in this measure? Why should one be taxed and the other not? As my friend, the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], who sits in the seat next to me to-day, suggests, there are thousands of men who make their livelihood by driving teams and in the carting business in this country.

The man who hauls mud along the railroads that are being constructed in this country, or were being constructed until we had a Democratic House [laughter on the Republican side] is compelled to pay a duty on his cart, while the man who uses the same vehicle on the farm 50 feet away has his vehicle brought into this country absolutely free of duty. The man who delivers groceries, and thousands upon thousands of men who use these vehicles in the conduct of their daily business, are discriminated against, and I regret, Mr. Chairman, I profoundly regret, not only that this measure should have assumed this form, but that it should be introduced by a party in which I have so many personal friends on the other side of this House. I hope, Mr. Chairman, since this opportunity is presented to the gentlemen on that side of the House of treating all people alike and placing them all on the same footing, that they will take advantage of it and make the bill general in its terms. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I will only detain the House a moment. It is with deep regret that I have seen the distinguished representative of the protective-tariff barons of Pittsburg come before this House and appeal for the rights of the common people. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The gentleman has overlooked the fact that this bill contains a provision which, if it becomes a law, will give free meat to the people of Pittsburg, who he says do not live on farms, and will give them free bread and free flour and free shoes and free cereals; yet, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MADDEN. We had free soup houses on the street corners in the large cities under the last Democratic administration. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. What a beautiful picture is presented over there! The representative of the tariff barons of Pittsburg and the representative of the monopolistic interests of Chicago sit side by side appealing for the interests of the plain people. [Laughter on the Democratic side.] But, Mr. Chairman, it makes me sad to know that within a few hours, when the roll is called in this House on this bill, and when the few remaining gentlemen in this House who stand for the great protected interests are summoned to the bar of this House to serve those interests by voting against this bill, when the opportunity is presented to them to vote to give their people free meat, free bread, and free shoes, we shall see them voting in the negative. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 1, line 9, by inserting after the word "agricultural" the words "horticultural and market garden."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I merely want to say that of course that broadens the bill. It broadens it beyond the scope that the committee contemplated, and as to what effect the amendment would have on the revenues of the country I am not prepared to say, because I do not know how far it would go. For that reason I hope the House will vote it down.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I want to see whether this is a fake or not.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 1, line 9, by inserting after the word "agricultural," the words "and horticultural."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the last amendment which I offered, which was voted down, added "horticultural and market garden," so that it would make free agricultural, horticultural, and market-garden implements. This amendment proposes to make free agricultural and horticultural implements. I do not know why the distinction is made, if it is intended to be made, between agricultural and horticultural implements. If it is the purpose of that side of the House not to give to orchard raisers any benefit from the bill, then they should vote down the amendment, and thereby, if the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] will make the statement, indicate that it was not intended by the bill to cover horticultural implements. It was perfectly plain, as I pointed out to the House some days ago, that under the general language of the bill there will be wide confusion as to what the bill means, if it becomes a law, such confusion as would require constant construction, and doubtless a statement from the gentleman from Alabama that he does not intend by this bill to cover horticultural or market-garden implements or tools will be of service in obtaining a proper construction of the law.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 1, line 9, by inserting after the word "implements" the words "and tools."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, whether the term "agricultural implements" includes agricultural tools one can not be certain about. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] a moment ago quoted one of his constituents as criticizing me in reference to my information about agricultural implements. There are some gentlemen in the country, and probably in the House, who can give me a great deal of information concerning agricultural implements, but no such gentleman comes from or lives in the city of New York. Is it proposed by the bill to include the ordinary agricultural tools used on a farm? Can anybody tell whether it is or not? Why not be a little more explicit and say whether you mean to include tools as well as implements, so that when they come to construe the law they will know, and when people import they will know.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 1, by inserting after the word "cultivators," in line 8, the following:

"Corn shellers, corn huskers, corn harvesters, combined corn sheller, husker, and bagger, combined corn sheller and husker, corn binders, ensilage cutters, potato planters, potato diggers, potato sorters, root cutters, pulpers and graters, straw stackers, cane loaders and unloaders, garden and field spraying machines, road scoops and scrapers, milking machines, dairy churns."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the items indicated in the amendment which I have sent to the Clerk's desk may or may not be construed to be agricultural implements. Do you confine the term "agricultural implements" to the articles which are named in your bill? You name a certain lot of machinery which is used on a farm and leave out a large quantity of other machinery which is used on the farm.

Are you proposing to put these articles upon the free list—corn shellers, corn huskers, corn binders, ensilage cutters, potato planters, straw stackers, cane loaders and unloaders, spreading machines, milking machines, churns—are they included under the language "all other agricultural implements"? If so, what is the harm of inserting them in the bill? If they are not so included, then your term "all other agricultural implements" is inserted in the bill not for the purpose of including items, but for the purpose of buncombe before the people. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto do now close.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama moves that all debate on the paragraph and pending amendments thereto do now close.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the ayes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. MANN) there were—ayes 142, noes 96.

So the motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes appeared to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. MANN) there were—ayes 82, noes 130.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer a further amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 2, line 2, by inserting before the word "parts," where it first occurs, the word "finished," so that it will read "whether in whole or in finished parts."

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer a further amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 2, line 2, by inserting before the word "repair" the word "finished," so that it will read "including finished repair parts."

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Insert, after line 2, on page 2, the following:

"The following articles, now dutiable under the tariff act of August 5, 1909, whenever imported for the purpose of being used in the construction and equipment of pulp and paper mills, or in the manufacture of the products of such mills, are hereby made exempt from all duties and are placed upon the free list:

"Sulphuric acid, alum, chloride of lime, aniline products, dyewoods, glue size, blanc-fixe, chrome colors, ocher earth, ultramarine vermilion reds, pigments, bichromate of potash, prussiate of red, prussiate of yellow, sal soda, soda ash, silicate of soda, sulphur, fire brick, brick (cement), tiles, cement (in packages), lime, china clay or kaolin, grindstones, pig iron, bar iron, steel beams, boiler or other plate iron or steel, forgings of iron or steel, cast-iron pipe, castings of iron or cast-iron plates, tanks or vessels, wire nails, cut nails and spikes, mill saws, circular saws, dextrin, starch, cotton waste, cotton belting, cotton duck, woolen felts and jackets, leather beltings, machinery, brass or copper wire cloth, bituminous coal, leather harness, crosscut saws."

During the reading of the above,

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane to the paragraph to which it is offered.

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say to the gentleman the amendment is short, there are only a few lines, and will the gentleman permit it to be read?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the gentleman merely desires to have the amendment read I have no objection.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I merely wish to offer a further amendment to the paragraph, and I understand this will not be considered as a new paragraph.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the amendment.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I renew the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend after the word "wagons," in line 8, page 1, by inserting "automobiles."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that it is not germane to this paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting after the word "implements," in line 9, page 1, the words "and farm machinery."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 2, after line 2, by inserting as a new paragraph, the following:

"The provisions of the last preceding paragraph shall not apply to articles imported from any country, dependency, province, or colony, or other subdivision of government, which imposes any tax or duty or restrictive regulation upon the importation into such country from the United States of any meats of any kind whatever, either fresh or preserved in any form, or of flour, live cattle, or cottonseed oil, or which prohibits or restricts in any way the exportation of news print paper, wood pulp, or pulp wood."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that is not germane to this paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I think this is a little different from the amendment offered before, applying to the entire bill. This amendment applies only to the paragraph relating to agricultural implements, and proposes to restrict the number of agricultural implements that can be brought into the country by providing that they can only be brought from countries which do not lay certain restrictions upon the importation of our goods. Suppose, Mr. Chairman, that we offered an amendment to this bill providing that the number of plows brought into the country in any one year should not exceed so many. That certainly would be germane to the proposition in the bill.

Now, the amendment which I offer proposes to say that the agricultural implements shall not be brought into this country free from any country which does not admit our meats free, or from any country which does not permit the free exportation of pulp wood.

We included, the other day, in the Canadian reciprocity bill the provision admitting, under certain conditions, paper free, with a provision as a condition precedent that there must be no restriction upon the exportation of paper or pulp wood from Canada. Was that restriction in order on that bill? If it was in order on that bill, not subject to a point of order upon it, then a proposition here to admit free of duty goods coming from the world can be limited to countries which do not impose a restriction upon the exportation of pulp wood. Let me say to that side of the House——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, the Chair has already ruled on the point of order, and I have no objection in the world to the gentleman from Illinois restating his case, but if he wants to make a speech to the House, I do not think he ought to do so.

Mr. MANN. I understood the Chair was willing to hear me. I did not know that I had to ask permission of the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I understood the Chair had sustained the point of order.

Mr. MANN. If I am in error, and the Chair did not say he was willing to hear me——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not think he ruled on this amendment.

Mr. MANN. It seems to me, in deference to that side of the House, the Chair can make a distinction in this case and the amendment previously offered to the entire bill, and can properly say that we can admit agricultural implements coming from countries which propose to do something for us on the other hand.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MANN. I offer a further amendment, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 2, after line 2, by inserting as a new paragraph the following:
"Matches, friction or lucifer, of all descriptions."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I could not hear the amendment.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that it is not germane.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer a further amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting, on page 2, after line 2, as a new paragraph the following:
"Baby cradles and baby carriages."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer a further amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers a further amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend page 2 by inserting, after line 2, as a new paragraph, the following:
"Hubs for wheels and wagon blocks."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against that.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer a further amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report a further amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting on page 2, after line 2, as a new paragraph, the following:
"Coffins."

[Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer a further amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers a further amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend page 2, after line 2, by inserting as a new paragraph the following:
"Gunpowder and all explosive substances used for mining, blasting, artillery, or sporting purposes."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. To that, Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the bill as follows:

Bagging for cotton, gunny cloth, and all similar fabrics, materials, or coverings, suitable for covering and baling cotton, composed in whole or in part of jute, jute butts, hemp, flax, seg, Russian seg, New Zealand tow, Norwegian tow, aloe, mill waste, cotton tares, or any other materials or fibers suitable for covering cotton; and burlaps and bags or sacks composed wholly or in part of jute or burlaps or other material suitable for bagging or sacking agricultural products.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2 strike out lines 3, 4, 5, 6, and 7 and line 8 to and including the word "cotton."

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I believe there is no duty in the whole tariff which is better justified, either from a protective standpoint or a tariff-for-revenue standpoint, than the duty on cotton bagging. The rate is low; it is less than 10 per cent ad valorem. The machinery by which bagging is made all has to be imported with a high duty of 45 per cent.

Then, the competition is not the ordinary competition which most articles produced in this country have to meet. The only serious competition that the American manufacturer of cotton bagging has to fear is from Calcutta, India, where wages are from a fifth to a tenth as much as the wages paid in the United States to the operatives engaged in this industry. You are protecting our industry, our laborers, against the cheapest labor in the world. And yet gentlemen on that side want to take away this small 10 per cent tariff and put cotton bagging on the free list.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. GILLETT. Yes.

Mr. COOPER. How much is the bagging worth on a bale of cotton?

Mr. GILLETT. I suppose about 50 cents.

Mr. COOPER. What is the tariff on that?

Mr. GILLETT. It would probably be about 4 cents.

Mr. COOPER. What is the value of a bale of cotton?

Mr. GILLETT. Oh, $80 or $90, I suppose.

Now, the gentleman from Alabama himself, in his opening speech, said he thought the American manufacturer ought to have an advantage; that he ought to have a percentage of advantage. What percentage ought he to have, if this 10 per cent is too much? Moreover, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] went on to state the argument in favor of taking off this tariff. And what did he state as his argument? He stated two facts. First, he said there was no tariff on binder twine. The gentleman knew that was not a fair analogy. He knew it was not a fair comparison.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I say it is a fair comparison.

Mr. GILLETT. When the tariff was taken off from binder twine, the gentleman knows that none had been imported for years. The tariff had been absolutely prohibitory, apparently. Yet to-day 20 per cent of all the cotton bagging that is used is imported. Moreover, after the duty was taken off from binding twine, none was imported for years, and at last all that has been imported has come from Canada; and if there is any country against which we need no tariff it is Canada, because Canada is nearer our standards of living and wages than any other country. So the gentleman's argument was unfair and fallacious. The competition of binding twine was absolutely unlike this Indian competition which we meet on bagging.

The only other argument the gentleman had to suggest was that the quality of bagging that is used now is very poor. I presume it is poor. If they want to pay more, they will get better bagging. Take the imported bagging, which constitutes 20 per cent of all that is used in this country; that is poor. But the poorest bagging that is used is much worse than this imported bagging and our new bagging. It is the bagging which is made up in a great many southern mills from old refuse bagging out of which they make a very inferior quality of bagging. They use it because it is cheap. The reason the bagging used is so poor is because the planters want to pay low prices.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I do not think this amendment for which the gentleman from Massachusetts speaks should prevail, nor do I think that this particular company that manufactures cotton bagging is entitled to any special consideration at the hands of this Congress.

I made the statement, and I think I have the proof, that the Ludlow Co., the American Manufacturing Co., and what is known as the Peru Co., one located in Massachusetts, one in New York, and one in Indiana, are the three concerns combined together for the purpose of manufacturing and selling cotton bagging and controlling the price. I have the proof before me in the testimony given before the Ways and Means Committee of the House in 1908, when Mr. Magner appeared there. He said:

I represent, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, all those manufacturers who are engaged in the manufacture of what is known as jute cloth made from jute butts in the United States. They are the Peru Bagging Manufacturing Co., of Indiana; the Ludlow Manufacturing Associates, of Ludlow, Mass.; and the American Manufacturing Co.

Now, a good deal has been said by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] in behalf of his constituents, known as the Ludlow Associates. These gentlemen are not engaged solely in making cotton bagging. They manufacture twine, hemp, carpet yarn, webbing, bagging for covering cotton, and cordage; and the manufacture of cotton bagging by the Ludlow people is only about one-fourth of the business that they do.

They appeared before the Ways and Means Committee together, they associated together in a memorial that they addressed to the Ways and Means Committee, and wherever you find the Ludlow Associates, the American Manufacturing Co., or the Peru company either before Congress or in the market, you find them combining together, not only to control legislation but to control the price of the article that they manufacture. As proof of that I read from the testimony of Mr. McMillan, who states this:

The American makers, say, three in number, consisting of the American Manufacturing Co., of New York; the Ludlow Manufacturing Associates, of Boston; and the Peru Bagging Manufacturing Co., of Peru, Ind., own and control every mill in America now engaged in making new bagging for cotton.

The first two corporations agree at the beginning of each season upon a price to open the market at, and the small Peru company follows. An arbitrary list, showing differentials throughout the entire cotton belt, is strictly followed, and the price named any given point by the American Manufacturing Co. is exactly the same as the one quoted same point by the Ludlow company.

So that wherever you find the Ludlow and the American people selling cotton bagging they are together, and the evidence demonstrates that they are a trust and are combined to control the price of the bagging.

Another thing, Mr. Chairman. We hear a good deal about cotton bagging being made in India. The whole importation of cotton bagging for any one year does not exceed 20,000,000 square yards. It takes 90,000,000 square yards of bagging to cover the cotton crop, and so far as statistics and the record show, the bagging mills of Scotland, which employ high-priced white labor, import every year and have imported many thousands of yards more cotton bagging than are imported from India. Not only that, but the proof is abundant and at hand that the American Manufacturing Co. and the Ludlow people went South, where there were three independent manufactories, bought out the stock, dismantled the mills, and issued stock to the stockholders of those mills in the American and Ludlow companies, and those independent companies have been idle for years. The whole control of the manufacture of American cotton bagging is in the hands of these three corporations, and they do not deserve any sympathy at the hands of Congress. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. CALDER) there were—ayes 63, noes 122.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and ask to have read in my time the editorial from the Washington Post of April 26, entitled "Free trade without inquiry," which I send to the desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks to have read in his time the following editorial from the Washington Post. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk proceeded to read the editorial.

Mr. UNDERWOOD (interrupting the reading). Mr. Chairman, it is not in order to read an article of that kind. Will not the gentleman accept unanimous consent to print?

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, the Chair ruled a while ago that that was in order on a proposition of this kind.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan is in error. The Chair did not rule that the Clerk might read the paper. The Chair did rule that the gentleman might read it as a part of his remarks.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order, and call the Chair's attention to the fact, that the objection did not come until after the Clerk had commenced to read the aricle.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken. The Clerk will continue the reading.

The Clerk read as follows:

[Wednesday, Apr. 26, 1911.]

FREE TRADE WITHOUT INQUIRY.

Has it not dawned upon northern Democrats in the House that perhaps four-fifths of the 100 articles on the farmers' free list are manufactured exclusively in the North? Is it not being brought home to them that the untaxing of not a few of these articles would not benefit any of the 5,000,000 American farmers living within 800 or 1,000 miles of the Canadian boundary—the very people whose interests, it is claimed, would be imperiled by reciprocity? On the other hand, you scan the list in vain for a single article which would, were the duty taken off, be advantageous alone to farmers whose products might be affected by the Canadian invasion. This is the avowed purpose of the farmers' free list, and yet the bulk of the promised benefits would go to farmers whose claims have no foundation in legitimacy. The northern farmer must divide his share with his southern neighbor, and then allow the latter to pocket a big bonus besides.

For illustration of how the free list would work out, take the item of jute bagging for cotton baling. The Ways and Means Committee says the proposed tariff changes are in the interest of all the people, but it does not appear that the farmers of New York or any of the 8,000,000 people of that State would profit an iota by putting jute bagging on the free list, although Brooklyn mills turn out most of the goods in this country—that is to say, in the cotton belt. About 20 per cent of jute bagging is imported from Calcutta, and it was in order to protect American labor from ruinous competition with the cheapest labor in the world that the tariff was put on. Take it off, and the Brooklyn mills must inevitably follow the Birmingham steel mills in closing down, throwing many thousands of people out of work, and sacrificing millions of capital.

The farmers' free list was steam rollered through the Democratic caucus, and it is not conceivable that any of the 25 Democrats on the New York delegation knew exactly what he was doing in pledging himself to vote for free jute bagging.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on the pending paragraph and all amendments thereto be now closed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the remainder of the editorial be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The caucus also cajoled the New Yorkers into voting to give no hearing to business interests affected by this high-handed procedure, and appeals from Brooklyn for a hearing were turned down. This snap-judgment, free-trade legislation practically amounts to confiscation of property. The North stands to lose pretty much everything the House would sacrifice on the altar of free trade, for what is true of jute is true in whole of a dozen other items and true in part as to the remainder.

Talk about the "robber" tariff! How about the robber free list? And also, how about the authoritative assurance that no legitimate business has anything to fear from a revision of the tariff?

Contrast this blind way of dealing with American industries with President Taft's statement to the free-trade leaders that he proposes to get all the facts before taking up general tariff legislation, and that "if the Democratic majority in the House act without investigation they must be held responsible for any damage or injustice they may do to capital or labor."

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. I will also read as a part of my remarks an extract from the Washington Post of another date:

[Friday, Apr. 21, 1911.]

TREASURY FEELING THE PINCH.

The earlier estimates of Treasury officials as to what the condition of Government finances would be at the close of the current fiscal year on June 30 are now seen to have been too optimistic. But it was only recently that the situation took a turn for the worse, and it was made apparent that the prediction that the deficit would disappear and a modest surplus take its place could scarcely be realized. The changed outlook is owing to unlooked-for slumps in both import duties and internal-revenue receipts, the corporation tax being the only item showing no falling off from the estimates. The deficit so far this month is about $4,000,000, whereas a year ago the receipts kept pace with the expenditures. The decline in revenue is about equally divided between customs and internal revenue—$2,000,000 each.

The falling off is attributed by Treasury authorities to the depression in trade, both foreign and domestic. The Treasury stood the strain long after general business began to crumple up, but it was only a question of time until Uncle Sam, too, would feel the pinch of the politicians' panic. The South also is beginning to feel the blighting effects of frenzied politics and mischievous legislation. Heavy cotton exports delayed the inevitable for a while, but the sharp decline in southern industrial stocks now in progress testifies to what is in store for that section, now that normal conditions prevail in the cotton markets.

Now that the Government feels the paralyzing effects of laws in restraint of trade, and it is seen that things will be worse before they are better, it seems probable that the issue of the Panama loan will be hastened in order to meet the exigency. The Government has at no time been anxious to float the canal obligation, and had the revenues come up to the early estimates the necessity of resorting to borrowing probably would have been obviated. Meanwhile Congress, or at least the House, contemplates taking action which can only have the effect of further limiting the Government's resources.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 2, by inserting after line 10, as a new paragraph, the following:

"The goods, wares, articles, and merchandise mentioned in the last preceding paragraph, manufactured wholly or in part in any foreign country by convict labor, shall not be entitled to entry at any of the ports of the United States, and the importation thereof is hereby prohibited."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to be heard on the point of order.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the Chair has already sustained the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has sustained the point of order.

Mr. MANN. Does the Chair decline to hear me on the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I appeal from the decision of the Chair. The Chair will not expedite matters by refusing a courteous hearing.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman has anything new to present the Chair will be glad to hear it.

Mr. MANN. The Chair absolutely declined to hear from me, although I have not wasted any of the time of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman may proceed if he has anything additional.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I have appealed from the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, now, what is the proposition? The proposition is to admit gunny cloth bagging for cloth bags or sacks, and so forth, free of duty. The law now provides—the Payne tariff law—that those articles can not be admitted at all made by convict labor, but you are proposing a new law, which would admit them although they are made by convict labor in foreign countries. Now, you propose to say that it is not in order when providing for the free admission of these into the United States that we may restrict those that are made by convict labor. It was in order when we passed the Payne tariff law under the rules which have been so roundly abused, but under your benign rules of the House you say it is not now in order to put in the same provision that we put into the Payne law. We proposed an amendment to keep out convict-made goods. You endeavor to extricate yourselves from the dilemma of voting upon a proposition by saying that it is not in order. Very well, we will let you test that by a vote in the House, and I will wait and see whether any gentlemen on the Democratic side of the House has the nerve or the courage or the hardihood in respect to labor interests to vote on tellers against sustaining the Chair so that we may write into the law a provision that these goods made by convict labor shall not be admitted in the United States, and every gentleman who votes to sustain the decision of the Chair votes to let in convict-made goods, and those who vote against sustaining the decision of the Chair vote to keep out convict-made goods. [Applause on the Republican side and cries of "Vote" !]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I will not detain the House but a minute. It is almost laughable the stress to which the gentleman from Illinois is driven to try to defeat an honest bill in the interest of the people. [Applause on the Democratic side.] He comes before this House with a pretense, and I will emphasize the word "pretense," that he is offering an amendment here in the interest of labor. An amendment coming from that side of the House in the interest of labor? [Applause on the Democratic side.] Why, Mr. Chairman, this bill that is offered to-day repeals no section of the Payne tariff law except the taxing section. There is nothing in this bill that repeals anything in the Payne law to which the gentleman refers. The Payne law in no way is changed so far as it relates to convict-made goods by the enactment of this law. It is a mere pretense, a cloak and a cover that you are trying to find to hide behind to carry home with you as an excuse for voting against a bill that will reduce the cost of living to the American people. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on the appeal do now close.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama moves that all debate on the appeal from the decision of the Chair do now close.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks for a division.

Mr. MANN. I ask for tellers. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman; it is impossible to hear the Chair, owing to the confusion. I do not know what the question is.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. It is on closing the debate.

Mr. MANN. I do not know that anybody wants to talk any more in debate; it is only a waste of time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama moved that all debate close on the appeal from the decision of the Chair, and that motion the Chair declared carried.

Mr. MANN. Nobody objects to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman withdraws his demand for tellers?

Mr. MANN. Yes; I withdraw the demand for tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on whether the decision of the Chair shall stand as the decision of the committee.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois demands tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

The question was taken; and the tellers (Mr. AUSTIN and Mr. UNDERWOOD) reported that there were—ayes 172, noes 73.

So the decision of the Chair stood as the decision of the committee.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer a further amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 2, after line 10, by inserting as a new paragraph the following:

"Binding twine, of whatever materials composed."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that is not germane to the item in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer a further amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 2, after line 10, by inserting as a new paragraph the following:

"Hemp, and tow of hemp, and hemp hackled, known as line of hemp."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make the same point of order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the bill proposes to admit free of duty bagging, and so forth, composed in whole or in part of jute, jute butts, hemp, flax, seg, Russian seg, and so forth. I have offered an amendment to place hemp on the free list. Is it not germane to a bill which proposes to put manufactured hemp on the free list to offer an amendment to put the raw material on the free list?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I will say in the confusion I could not hear the gentleman's amendment. If his purpose relates to hemp, I will withdraw the point of order and ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment again.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer a further amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, by inserting on page 2, after line 10, as a new paragraph, the following:

"Jute manufacturing machinery, linotype and all typesetting machines, printing presses, typewriters, and cash registers."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, it is proposed in the bill to put jute and manufactured articles on the free list. This amendment proposes to put jute-manufacturing machinery on the free list. It seemed to me that when a bill which proposes to put the manufactured article upon the free list it ought to be germane to offer an amendment to put the machinery by which that article is produced in the United States upon the free list.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama insist upon his point of order?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I insist upon the point of order; yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. MANN. I also offer a further amendment, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk reads as follows:

Amend, on page 2, by inserting after line 10, as a new paragraph, the following:

"Table, kitchen, and hospital utensils, or other similar hollow ware of iron or steel, enameled or glazed with vitreous glasses, but not ornamented or decorated with lithographic or other printing."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama makes a point of order. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. MANN. I also offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, by inserting on page 2, after line 10, as a new paragraph, the following:

"Table, butchers', carving, cooks', kitchen, bread, butter, vegetable, cheese, hay, tanners', plumbers', and shoe knives, forks, and steels, with or without handles."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order that it is not germane to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer a further amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 2, after line 10, by inserting as a new paragraph, the following:

"Razor blades, handles, and unfinished razors."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. MANN. I hope the gentleman will not insist upon his point of order. The duty on these articles is now 283 per cent.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Who put it on? The Republicans! [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. I did not.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I have another amendment if the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] insists upon his point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers another amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 2, by inserting, after line 10, as a new paragraph the following:

"Iron ore, including manganiferous iron ore, and the dross or residuum from burnt pyrites."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Against that, Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, do I understand the Chair sustains the point of order against an amendment putting iron ore on the free list, when the bill puts a large number of products of iron ore upon the free list? Does the Chair hold it is not in order when you put steel and iron products upon the free list?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Chair has already sustained the point of order.

Mr. MANN. If the Chair will rule loudly enough to be heard at this point——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair, perhaps, has not spoken loudly enough.

Mr. MANN. We have been unable to hear the Chair here for some time.

Mr. HANNA. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. HANNA] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Between lines 10 and 11, as a new paragraph, on page 2 of the printed bill, add the following:

"Sugars not above No. 16 Dutch standard in color, tank bottoms, sirups of cane juice, melada, concentrated melada, concrete and concentrated molasses"——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against that, that the amendment is not germane.

Mr. KENDALL. I will suggest to the gentleman from Alabama that there may be something in the amendment that relieves it of the objection. It may have some countervailing provision or feature to recommend it.

Mr. PAYNE. I think the gentleman from Alabama ought to wait to see if it will reduce the high cost of living. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman that I am sure the only reduction in the high cost of living will come from this side of the House. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. KENDALL. Give the breakfast table a chance. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the gentleman wants to have the amendment read in full, so that it may go into the RECORD, I have no objection. It is really out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the remainder of the amendment.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the amendment, as follows:

Testing by the polariscope not above 75°, forty-seven and one-half one-hundredths of 1 cent per pound, and for every additional degree shown by the polariscopic test seventeen and one-half one-thousandths of 1 cent per pound additional, and fractions of a degree in proportion; and on sugar above No. 16 Dutch standard in color, and on all sugar which has gone through a process of refining, ninety-five one-hundredths of 1 cent per pound; molasses, testing not above 40°, 10 per cent ad valorem; testing above 40° and not above 56°, 1½ cents per gallon; testing above 56°, 3 cents per gallon; sugar drainings and sugar sweepings shall be subject to duty as molasses or sugar, as the case may be, according to polariscopic test.

Mr. HANNA. Mr. Chairman, the adoption of this amendment will reduce the tariff upon sugar exactly one-half. It is in the interest of every citizen in this country and should be adopted.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, to that I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I have another amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 5, page 2, add the following: "And binding twine made from hemp."

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Debate is all closed on that proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate has closed on the pending paragraph. The question is on striking out the last word of the paragraph. Does the gentleman insist upon it? Debate upon the paragraph has closed. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"] The gentleman from Michigan withdraws his pro forma amendment. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Hoop or band iron, or hoop or band steel, cut to lengths, punched or not punched, or wholly or partly manufactured into hoops or ties, coated or not coated with paint or any other preparation, with or without buckles or fastenings, for baling cotton or any other commodity; and wire for baling hay, straw, and other agricultural products.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 2, after line 16, by inserting as a new paragraph the following:

"The articles named in the last preceding paragraph shall be admitted free only when imported into the United States from a country, dependency, Province, or colony, being the product thereof, which imposes no tax or duty or restrictive regulation upon the importation into such country, dependency, Province, or colony from the United States of live domestic animals, fresh or refrigerated and prepared or preserved meats, wheat, rye, oats, barley, buckwheat, corn or maize, cottonseed oil."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against that amendment that it is not germane.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. MANN. I offer a further amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting, on page 2, after line 16, as a new paragraph the following:

"Watch movements, including time detectors, whether imported in cases or not, if having not more than seven jewels each; lever clock movements, and clocks, and parts thereof, not otherwise specially provided for by law."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I make the point of order against that amendment that it is not germane.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. MANN. I offer a further amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting on page 2, after line 16, as a new paragraph, the following:

"Type metal and new types."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I make the point of order against that amendment that it is not germane.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. MANN. I offer a further amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend line 16, page 2, by adding at the end thereof the following: "Provided, That said articles shall not have been manufactured in any establishment where the eight-hour rule for labor has not been observed."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I make the point of order against that amendment that it is not germane.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I am compelled to appeal from the decision of the Chair on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois appeals from the decision of the Chair. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. MANN. I will ask for a division on that, to see whether anybody on that side votes for eight hours for labor.

The committee again divided; and there were—ayes 107, nays 73.

Accordingly the decision of the Chair was sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

Grain, buff, split, rough and sole leather, band, bend, or belting leather, boots and shoes made wholly or in chief value of leather made from cattle hides and cattle skins of whatever weight, of cattle of the bovine species, including calfskins; and harness, saddles, and saddlery, in sets or in parts, finished or unfinished, composed wholly or in chief value of leather; and leather cut into shoe uppers or vamps or other forms suitable for conversion into manufactured articles.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all of paragraph on page 2, beginning with the word "grain," on line 17, and ending with the word "articles," on line 24.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, before that amendment is put, which is to strike out, I suppose it is in order to perfect the text of the paragraph, and I offer an amendment for that purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers the following amendment to perfect the paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 2, by inserting at the end of line 20 the following:
"Kangaroo, sheep, and goat skins (including lamb and kid skins), dressed and finished; patent, japanned, varnished, or enameled leather and glove leather."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, just a word. The bill proposes to make free any leather—cut into shoe uppers or vamps, or other forms suitable for conversion into manufactured articles.

If some work has been done upon the leather it is admitted free of duty. The amendment which I offer is to admit free of duty goatskin leather, which is the leather usually used in the manufacture of ladies' shoes, so that the manufacturers here may compete on even terms with the manufacturers abroad. Under this bill, if they import their leather without being partly manufactured, they can not compete with other manufacturers who import free partly manufactured leather of the same kind. We would drive out of this country the manufacturers of ladies' shoes, except the mere putting together of partly manufactured leather. There is a duty of 15 per cent upon this leather left by this bill, but taken off if it is partly manufactured. There is no logic in taking the duty off the material when partly manufactured, but leaving it on entirely before the process of manufacture has begun.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman and fellow Congressmen, the President of the United States, by convening Congress in special session within a month after the sine die adjournment of the Sixty-first Congress, has admitted to the world the necessity of immediate legislation in America for the relief of the people from existing conditions.

In his message to this Congress a short time ago he does not tell us just what our troubles are, but from the fact that he deals only with one subject—the reciprocity treaty with Canada—and his urgent request for the enactment of its provisions into law, we are led to the conclusion that he believes that the passage of such a law would be a panacea for all of our national ills, whatever they may be.

This treaty was entered into last winter. The President then urged the passage of a law by the Sixty-first Congress carrying into effect its provisions. Congressman McCALL, of Massachusetts, introduced a bill for that purpose, which passed the lower House but failed to be considered by the Senate. At the beginning of this session Congressman McCALL and Congressman UNDERWOOD, of Alabama, each introduced a bill for the same purpose. The Ways and Means Committee reported out Mr. UNDERWOOD's bill, and it passed the House a few days ago. It is well known to the people throughout the land that our greatest burden now is, and for some time has been, the high cost of living. If this treaty is enacted into law, will it relieve the people from existing conditions? I was in Washington last February, when it was first made known to the public, and gave it a very careful and painstaking study. I was anxious to be for any measure which would bring relief to the masses, but was forced by the terms of this treaty to conclude that it was in keeping with former trust-made legislation. It very forcibly reminded me of one of Æsop's fables, in which the lion, desiring to rid himself of the trouble of chasing down his prey, pretended to be sick, and issued a proclamation inviting all the other beasts to visit him. Some time after the proclamation was issued he met the fox and demanded of him why he had stayed away, whereupon the fox replied:

I was often moved to visit your majesty and minister unto your wants, but on each occasion when I approached the door of your lair I found the tracks of many beasts entering in, but none coming out. I was thereby frightened away, and did not dare enter.

The same is true as to this treaty. All of its provisions lead directly into the camps of the trusts and none into the homes of the people. It places the crude products of the farm and the forest on the free list, and just as soon as the combines get possession of them and convert them into the finished products we find them securely hiding behind a high wall of protection. For instance, all grain out of which bread is made is placed on the free list; all farm animals out of which we make meat are placed on the free list; all crude lumber, which comes largely from the little sawmills in the swamps, is placed on the free list; but just as soon as the grain is changed into meal or flour or the animal is converted into meat or the crude lumber receives a slight polish from the plane this treaty shouts aloud, "High protection." Why should the Milling Trust have a high protection upon its products? Is there any more need for a protective tariff on meal and flour than there is on wheat, corn, rye, barley, and oats? Why should the criminal meat packers have a high protective tariff on meat? It is true that 10 of them stand indicted in the Federal courts of Chicago for conspiracy in restraint of trade. They have received one immunity, and now they are pleading for another. I can see no reason why they should be sheltered by a high protective tariff, unless it is for the purpose of forcing the people to contribute enough money to pay their fines in case they are convicted. I can not understand why the crude lumber from the little sawmills in the swamps should be placed on the free list, thereby striking a blow at labor and individuality, and the finished product placed on the highly protected list, unless it is for the purpose of giving the Lumber Trust an opportunity to continue its exploitations of the people.

What is true of these articles is true as to the whole of this treaty. It is a direct slap in the face at labor and at the farmer, and a sop for the rich. It was intended for the voice of Jacob, but it is the hand of Esau. I was not willing to say to the farmers and to labor that they were criminals and responsible for the widespread suffering resulting from the high cost of living and at the same time say by my vote to the criminal combines that they are good fellows and innocent.

Such legislation in the past has driven businesses on a small scale into bankruptcy by the countless thousands. Cheap living can not be maintained by congesting business in centers in the hands of a few, but the best results may be had from leaving the business scattered over the country in the hands of the industrious many, within easy reach of the consumer.

Reciprocity with Canada is no new discovery. In 1854 we passed a law giving free trade with Canada, and after experimenting with it for 10 years it was repealed.

Prior to the advent of the hobble skirt in society the width of a society woman's hat could be measured by 5 society steps, but now it requires 15 society hobble-skirt steps to measure the width of the same hat; now, suppose the hobble-skirt step should be shortened by tightening the hobble in the skirt. What effect would that have in reducing the cost of common living? Would the enactment of the provisions of this reciprocity treaty with Canada into law do more? I believe in calling a spade a spade, and am not willing to be led away from the real issue before the people by baiting my hook to fish for foolish gudgeon. Under the blighting influence of the high cost of the necessaries of life we have seen the dollar laid by for a rainy day, and often goodly sized bank accounts, vanish like a shadow, and to-day in many quarters of this country—the land of the greatest plenty—hungry children cry for bread with none to give and helpless mothers wring their hands in despair and pray to the God of Heaven for relief.

If real relief from such conditions can be given by righteous legislation at the hands of a just Congress, let us begin the task at once, and in order to do our whole duty let us brush away the cobwebs of party prejudice and tear off the masks of servitude to our former business masters, thereby emulating the example of honest John Quincy Adams, who so signally honored this branch of Congress by selling his private bank stock before taking his seat in Congress, so that nothing would stand between him and his duty to the people in voting upon the question of national banks; let us lift our hearts to the mighty Ruler of the Universe for an inspiration of thought and a rectitude of conscience, to the end that our deliberations may be full of wisdom and purity, for the people at large are entitled to our best effort, our highest honor, and our keenest statesmanship. [Applause.]

I believe that the bill now under consideration, the farmers' free-list bill, has much merit in it. It is said by some that it is intended to pay back to the farmer what he lost by the passage of the Canadian reciprocity bill. Whatever motive may have prompted its recommendation for passage is certainly most commendable, for its provisions suggest relief to the many from heavy burdens which have been endured for half a century. It proposes to give to the farmer free from tariff taxation the implements and machinery necessary for the cultivation of the soil and necessary in harvesting, handling, and garnering his crops. It also gives him free wire for his fence. This provision of the bill, it is true, will affect the interests of the Steel Trust and the Harvester and Farmers' Implement Trust mostly, but neither one of them ought to complain, for in 1908 they both sent their representatives before the Ways and Means Committee, and there, under oath, they told that committee that iron and steel could be produced in America cheaper than in any other country in the world and that they did not need any protection for their businesses.

During the year 1910 the Harvester Trust exported from this country to foreign countries its products, such as mowers, reapers, plows, cultivators, and other implements, in the amount of $28,124,033. During the same year articles such as the Steel Trust manufactures were exported from this country to foreign countries to the amount of $179,133,186.

Another provision of this bill places leather made of cowhides and calfskins, boots and shoes and parts thereof, harness and saddles and all parts thereof, made out of cowhide leather, on the free list. The tanners, leather dealers, and manufacturers of boots and shoes certainly will not complain at this provision of the bill, because they went in great droves and herds before the same Ways and Means Committee in 1908, and, under oath, told that committee that if Congress would put hides on the free list the world would be a "cinch" to their business; that they were then exporting boots and shoes to more than 40 different foreign countries. They promised us cheaper boots and shoes if the duty on hides were removed, which is shown by the following extracts:

[Extracts from evidence given by manufacturers of leather and boots and shoes.]

First. Extracts from the statements of Mr. Elisha W. Cobb, manufacturer of split leather, Boston, Mass.:

"Mr. COBB. I am a manufacturer of heavy leather, called split leather. My experience runs over 30 years in a concentrated line of hide upper leather, called cowhides, which business has possibly been affected more by the duty on beef hides than any other.

"Mr. MCCALL. Now, Mr. Cobb, what do you think about the effect of making upper leather in this country—of putting upper leather on the free list?

"Mr. COBB. Answering your question, I would say if I can buy my hides on the free list, I think the American upper-leather tanner can beat the world.

"Mr. BOUTELL. Personally you would not object to putting leather on the free list?

"Mr. COBB. Personally, no, sir."

[Extracts from the evidence of Mr. Charles H. Jones, of Boston, Mass., representing the New England Shoe and Leather Association.]

The CHAIRMAN. What class of shoes do you manufacture?

Mr. JONES. We manufacture men's fine shoes, as they are called in the trade, retailing from $3 to $5 per pair.

Mr. COCHRAN. I assume, then, it is your opinion that the giving of free raw material would enable you to take your chances without protection?

Mr. JONES. I am glad to say that I am on record in a statement, made several years ago, to the effect that I should be glad to see shoes absolutely free if all the leather and other materials were free. The New England Shoe and Leather Association was united in that view at that time.

[Telegram.]

LYNN, MASS., November 24.

Hon. SERENO E. PAYNE,
Chairman of Ways and Means Committee,
Washington, D. C.:

As probably the largest manufacturers of women's fine shoes in the world, the Sorosis Shoe Co. desires to go on record as declaring the present tariff on such shoes as we manufacture wholly unnecessary to our success and a distinct injustice to the consuming public. We favor the complete abrogation of this tariff, welcoming the competition of the world. We should be glad, at the convenience of the Ways and Means Committee, to present arguments for the removal of the duty on boots and shoes like those of our own manufacture.

[Extracts from the evidence of Henry J. McFarland, of Chicago, Ill., president of M. D. Wells & Co.]

Mr. MCFARLAND. All I want to say is that the West emphatically indorses the position of Mr. Jones, who has very ably stated it.

Mr. RANDELL. You say that the manufacturers of shoes in this country can compete with those of any country in the world, in your opinion? You mean in the markets of the world?

Mr. MCFARLAND. Yes.

Mr. RANDELL. You do not just confine that to this country, the home market, but you mean the markets of the world?

Mr. MCFARLAND. I mean the skill with which shoes are manufactured; the skilled workmen of this country can overcome the handicap of price of foreign labor.

Mr. RANDELL. And enable you to meet them in the markets of the world?

Mr. MCFARLAND. Meet them anywhere.

[Extracts from the evidence of Charles A. McCarthy, of Auburn, N. Y., shoe manufacturer, November 28, 1908, before the Ways and Means Committee.]

Mr. NEEDHAM. Your position is that if we take this tariff off of it, meaning hides, will reduce shoes 25 cents a pair?

Mr. MCCARTHY. I did not say that.

Mr. NEEDHAM. You gave an illustration of a family using 10 pairs of shoes a year, and you said that they would get their shoes for 25 cents a pair less?

Mr. MCCARTHY. I said when the price went up. If the price was changed and went down, it would go in the same ratio. I should say if they change the price.

Mr. COCHRAN. If there was any change it would be a change not of 5 or 10 cents, but it would be 25 cents.

Mr. NEEDHAM. Do you think they would reduce the price of the shoes to the consumer?

Mr. MCCARTHY. They would either do that or give them a better shoe.

This was done by the last Congress, but instead of receiving cheaper footwear we have been compelled to pay from 10 to 20 per cent more for our boots and shoes, which is illustrated by a little conversation I had with a Republican friend of mine, who has been employed in this Capitol building for many years and for whose veracity I vouch. I asked him where he bought that nice, easy shoe he was wearing. He replied, "Here in Washington." I then asked him what he paid for it, and he replied: "I have been wearing this shoe for 8 or 10 years. I always paid $4.50 for it until this year. I paid $5 for this pair." During the year 1910 dealers in leather, boots, and shoes exported to foreign countries their goods in the sum of $52,647,745. I hold a telegram in my hand from a large number of manufacturers of Chicago, protesting against the provisions of this bill, which I ask to be made a part of the RECORD:

CHICAGO, ILL., April 27, 1911.

Hon. H. ROBERT FOWLER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

Foreign shoe manufacturers have free material, pay no royalty on machinery, and get labor at about half paid in this country. How can we Illinois manufacturers and wholesalers of shoes compete under these conditions if shoes are admitted free? Tariff on shoes is only 10 per cent; on all other wearing apparel averages 60 per cent. Why should shoes bear all the burden in the plan to reduce the cost of living? We earnestly protest against the removal of duty on shoes under existing conditions.

Selz, Schwab & Co.; J. P. Smith Shoe Co.; Smith-Wallace Shoe Co.; Watson-Plummer Shoe Co.; H. F. C. Dovenmuehle & Sons; The Rice & Hutchins Chicago Shoe Co.; Florsheim Shoe Co.; Guthman, Carpenter & Telling; J. E. Tilt Shoe Co.; Fargo & Phelps; A. A. Putnam & Son; R. P. Smith & Sons Co.

Another provision of the bill places bread and meat on the free list, thereby forcing the Milling Trust to give us larger biscuits for breakfast and the Beef Trust to give us richer roasts for dinner. The meat packers exported to foreign countries during last year meats and meat and dairy products to the amount of $130,632,783, and sold them in the free-trade markets of the world.

By placing lumber and all building materials, both rough and dressed, on the free list, it gives the poor a better chance to get homes of their own, thereby relieving them of a long-felt want of independence in their domestic surroundings.

What a contrast between this bill, which seeks to lighten the burden from the shoulders of the toiling masses, and the free list in the Payne-Aldrich tariff law, which places in the hands of the criminal combinations a more powerful and effective weapon. It gives to the idle rich, diamonds, furs, and silks without taxation; it gives to the poor, blankets taxed at 107 per cent; it gives to the common housewife, woolen dress goods taxed at 135 per cent; and it gives to the infant child, flannels taxed at 143 per cent. But this is not all. It places upon the free list turtles, an animal whose characteristic, when discovered, is to dive to the bottom and stir up the mud from below to conceal its miserable form. I do not know why turtles should be placed on the free list, unless it was for the purpose of stirring up enough mud in the stream of public thought to hide the miserable features of this law. You fellows who voted for that law placed ipecac, a very powerful emetic, upon the free list. It is said that the Payne-Aldrich tariff law is a more powerful emetic, by far, than has ever been discovered by the most skillful metallurgist. I understand that when the bill was first introduced into Congress its very sight was so revolting to the stomachs of 20 brave insurgent Republicans that they did not dare swallow any part of it. I also understand that my colleague from Illinois [Mr. MANN], who recently charged the new Members on this side of the Chamber with being ignorant and impudent, swallowed it without a frown [laughter and applause], and, like the swashbuckler who swallowed a big beetle, it has not even made him sick on his stomach yet. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

You put old gunny bags and old junk on the free list for the Bag Trust. Our bill places new bags and new burlap on the free list for the farmer's grain and cotton. You place brimstone in blocks and sulphur in bulk on the free list. Did you think that by placing these two articles on the free list in such large quantities you could fool the devil and thereby induce him to exhaust his stock of punishment before you died? [Laughter and applause.] We place sewing machines on the free list for the farmer's wife and salt on the free list for his stock. You placed St. John's bean on the free list. What a cowardly act. Why did you not place Farmer John's buttons for his trousers on the free list instead of taxing them 126 per cent? The power which you placed in the hands of the criminal combinations by the passage of the Payne-Aldrich tariff law reminds me of a play I once saw enacted on the stage, with the scene laid in the home of a Southern planter, whose beautiful daughter had a young neighbor Chesterfield for a sweetheart. During one evening of their courtship the old colored maidservant came in with some beautiful flowers. The young gallant Chesterfield, rising, took from his pocket a silver dollar, and presented it to her, saying: "Auntie, there's 50 cents for you and 50 cents for Pete," the colored manservant. She at once raised aloft the silver dollar and exclaimed: "A whole dollar. Fifty cents fo' me and 50 cents fo' Pete." We all applauded her plain honesty. She came back again, raising the silver dollar aloft and exclaimed: "A whole dollar. Seventy-five cents fo' me and 25 cents fo' Pete." We were all surprised, and she went away without applause. She came back again and raised the silver dollar aloft and exclaimed, "A whole dollar. Ninety cents fo' me and 10 cents fo' Pete." We saw the trick and were disgusted. She went away, but soon came back on the stage for the last time and, raising the dollar aloft, exclaimed, "A whole dollar. One hundred cents fo' me and nothing fo' Pete." [Laughter and applause.] The powerful combinations come to us with fairness until they secure laws for their benefit, and after they get the possession of power given them by the law, they begin their oppressions, and, like the old colored maidservant, "A whole dollar; 100 cents for the combine and nothing for the people." The bill under consideration seeks relief for the people as against the extortion of the trusts. It has within its provisions a kiss for the sunny South and at the same time a gentle smile for the rugged North; it is an answer to the prayer of labor long oppressed; it is a balm for the heart of grief; it is bread for the mouth of hunger. Let us vote for it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on the paragraph and all amendments thereto be closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama moves that all debate on the paragraph and amendments thereto be closed.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman will not ask that; this is an important paragraph.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have no desire in the world to cut off debate—that is, legitimate debate—and if the gentleman has an amendment which he desires to offer——

Mr. MANN. No; but the gentleman from Missouri offered an amendment, and I took him off the floor by offering an amendment which took precedence, and he has not had the floor yet.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will say to the gentleman from Alabama, the gentleman from Missouri had been recognized when the gentleman from Illinois arose and addressed the committee.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then I move that debate on the pending paragraph and amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama moves that debate on the pending paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. MANN. I ask for a division on that vote to close debate.

The CHAIRMAN. There is an amendment pending offered by the gentleman from Missouri, who has a right——

Mr. MANN. But, Mr. Chairman, I have several times asked for a division on the vote to close debate.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order it is too late.

Mr. MANN. I was not too late when I was trying to attract the attention of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri has the attention of the Chair.

Mr. MANN. But I asked for a division as soon as the vote was put.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized.

Mr. MANN. I will give fair warning that the gentleman will not make any time by refusing fairness to the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has no such disposition, but simply desires to give the gentleman from Missouri the right which he has.

Mr. MANN. As soon as the gentleman from Illinois could learn the decision of the Chair, because we could not hear the Chair here——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. MANN. But, Mr. Chairman, I asked for a division and the Chair declines a division and the Chair must rule——

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry, what is the pending amendment? I ask to have the amendment reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all of paragraph on page 2 beginning with the word "grain" in line 17 and ending with the word "articles" in line 24.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment to perfect the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROBERTS] offers an amendment to perfect the paragraph. The Clerk will report the amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. What became of the amendment which I offered? I have an amendment pending there, if the Chair will ascertain where it is.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment was reported to the House. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROBERTS].

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, line 19, strike out after the word "leather" the words "made from cattle hides and cattle skins of whatever weight, of cattle of the bovine species, including calfskin," and insert in lieu thereof the following: "Of any kind or description, including all materials of every kind or description entering into the composition of such boots and shoes, whether specifically mentioned herein or not, and whether in whole or in parts, including repair parts."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I raise the point of order against the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROBERTS.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offered an amendment some time ago which has not yet been disposed of, to perfect this paragraph. It would have precedence, of course.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from Illinois will be put to the House before the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER.]

Mr. MANN. The amendment which I offered must be disposed of before any other amendment is offered, unless it be an amendment to my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well. The question, then, is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], and the debate is limited to 10 minutes, according to the order, on that amendment and all other amendments to the paragraph.

Does the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER] desire to debate his amendment? If so, the Chair will recognize him for that purpose.

Mr. MANN. I do not understand.

Mr. FITZGERALD. You have not demanded recognition. He said your amendment was before the House.

Mr. MANN. I am not asking for debate.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Let us vote on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN.]

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROBERTS] offers an amendment to perfect the paragraph.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. I understand the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] made a point of order against the amendment offered by myself?

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment will again be reported by the Clerk.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I raise the point of order that this amendment is in violation of section 3, Rule XXI, and section 7, Rule XVI. This amendment seeks to place on the free list all shoes of any kind whatsoever, whereas the bill which we are considering only places on the free list boots and shoes whose uppers are made of calfskin or of cattle hides, all of which are now admitted at 10 per cent duty. The amendment offered by my colleague [Mr. ROBERTS] would put on the free list boots and shoes whose uppers are made of goatskin, sheepskins, kangaroo skins, and other skins, which are admitted at 15 per cent—at a different rate. Now, Mr. Chairman, we find clearly in the decisions that a general provision may not be offered as germane to a specific provision. In other words, a general provision for free boots and shoes of all kinds is not germane to a specific provision placing on the free list boots and shoes whose uppers are made of calfskins and hide leather. Moreover, the amendment is obnoxious to the rule contained in paragraph 3, Rule XXI, inasmuch as it does not directly relate to the item to which the amendment is proposed.

The CHAIRMAN. In the opinion of the Chair the amendment simply amplifies the provision of the section, and makes the section or the paragraph relate not alone to boots and shoes made wholly of leather from cattle hides and cattle skins, but boots and shoes made from leather, whether from cattle hides or other skins. In the opinion of the Chair the amendment is germane to the paragraph. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard briefly on this amendment. Its purpose is twofold: First, to give to the people of the country——

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri will state it.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, I would like to inquire which amendment is now pending before the House—the one offered by the gentleman from Missouri, or the one offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts?

The CHAIRMAN. The one offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. The gentleman from Missouri had been recognized and his amendment was read.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER] was to strike out the paragraph, and this present amendment is to perfect the paragraph.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of the amendment is twofold, as I said: First, to carry out fully the Democratic theory that is extended in this bill, that placing boots and shoes upon the free list will cheapen the cost of those articles to the American people. Now, as the bill stands, unamended, boots and shoes, manufactured, are placed on the free list, but only boots and shoes manufactured of a certain kind. If the Democrats are sincere in their desire that the people shall have the full benefit of free boots and shoes, then I ask that they put all kinds of boots and shoes upon the free list.

The second purpose of the amendment is to give the American boot and shoe workers and the American boot and shoe manufacturers a living show in the manufacture of boots and shoes. If boots and shoes go on the free list, as the bill is now worded, the boots and shoes manufactured come in free, and the American manufacturers and the American shoe workers are handicapped by a tariff on all the parts that enter into a boot and shoe. The boots and shoes coming in free from abroad bring with them free all the findings, all the component parts of the boots and shoes, while the American manufacturers, if they want to take advantage of the American market and produce boots and shoes at home, must pay a duty upon the materials that enter into the making of a boot and shoe.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. I regret I can not yield. I have only five minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman wishes to modify the existing paragraph?

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. I wish to extend it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. And the gentleman's colleague [Mr. GARDNER], who professes to be the representative of the boot and shoe industry, opposes what the gentleman [Mr. ROBERTS] is attempting to do.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. I do not know what my colleague is doing, but I am trying to help the boot and shoe workers and manufacturers against the extreme iniquity of this proposition of free boots and shoes.

Now, I assume that my Democratic friends are honest when they say they want to give the American people cheaper boots and shoes. I assume that they are not entering into a system of reprisal on the American manufacturers of boots and shoes when they seek to place boots and shoes upon the free list, and if they are not making any reprisal on the manufacturers in this country, then in Heaven's name give them an equal chance with the foreign manufacturer, and give them everything that goes into the shoe free of duty, and not allow the foreign shoe to come in here free and tax the American manufacturers on all of the component parts of the shoe.

That is the purpose of the amendment, and the chief purpose of it, and it must be apparent to my Democratic friends that it is a fair amendment to offer, unless they are out to "do" the shoe worker and the shoe manufacturer.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Which of the two gentlemen from Massachusetts shall we follow—the gentleman who has just spoken, or the other gentleman [Mr. GARDNER]?

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROBERTS].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. KENDALL. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 54, noes 106.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD at this point a telegram which I have received from a number of shoe manufacturers in Louisville, Ky., and which explains why they regard the provisions of this paragraph as inimical to their business.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a telegram received from shoe manufacturers of Louisville, Ky. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The telegram referred to is as follows:

LOUISVILLE, KY., May 1, 1911.

Hon. JOHN W. LANGLEY,
Congressman, care of House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.:

Foreign shoe manufacturers have free material, pay no royalty on machinery, and get labor at about half paid in this country. How can we Kentucky manufacturers and wholesalers of shoes compete under these conditions if shoes are admitted free? Tariff on shoes is only 10 per cent; on all other wearing apparel averages 60 per cent. Why should shoes bear all the burden in the plan to reduce the cost of living? We earnestly protest against the removal of duty on shoes under existing conditions.

CONRAD SHOE CO.
VOGEL BROS. SHOE CO.
JOHN J. SCHULTEN CO.
QUAST SHOE MANUFACTURING CO.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment: Strike out all of paragraph on page 2 beginning with the word "grain," on line 17, and ending with the word "articles," on line 24, as follows:

Grain, buff, split, rough, and sole leather; band, bend, or belting leather; boots and shoes, made wholly or in chief value of leather made from cattle hides and cattle skins of whatever weight, of cattle of the bovine species, including calfskins; and harness, saddles, and saddlery, in sets or in parts, finished or unfinished, composed wholly or in chief value of leather; and leather cut into shoe uppers or vamps or other forms suitable for conversion into manufactured articles.

Mr. Chairman, the amendment which I have presented is to strike out that paragraph in the bill which proposes to put boots and shoes and the other articles mentioned therein on the free list, and which, if the said bill is enacted into law, would result in all of them being brought into this country free of duty. In other words, the American manufacturer of boots and shoes and the American workmen engaged in said industry would have to compete with the whole world; and this in the face of the undisputed fact that the wage earners in the boot and shoe industry in this country are paid from a third to one-half more by the American shoe manufacturers than the wages that are paid by the manufacturers of boots and shoes in foreign countries. It has not been claimed by anyone in this House during this debate that the wages paid the American workingmen by the shoe manufacturers are too high, nor has it been claimed that the shoe manufacturers in this country are making anything except a very reasonable profit, it being practically agreed that the net profit to the shoe manufacturer in this country in the past year has been between 4 and 5 per cent on the money invested in this industry. I am not a high-tariff advocate, but I do thoroughly believe that we should not enact any law that will cheapen labor in this country. Our standard of living is different from that in most all of the foreign countries and the wages paid in this country to-day in this industry is only sufficient for decent living and for the proper rearing and educating of the children of the American workingman.

On May 1 I addressed this House in opposition to this bill, especially as it affected the bagging and boot and shoe industries in the city of St. Louis, my home and my constituents, and now I do not desire to take any further time of this House in calling to its attention the facts, figures, and arguments that I presented then against the putting of those articles upon the free list, thereby establishing free trade with all the world on these goods, to the great detriment and injury of the American workingman and the American manufacturer. I will now add a word in support of this motion, only with reference to the boot and shoe industry—not locally and not as it affects my own city and my own district especially, but in its relation to the whole country, and how harmful and detrimental free trade in the boot and shoe industry will work to that great army of American workingmen and American laborers whose only livelihood comes from their being able to secure profitable and living employment in this great industry. I am indebted in a large measure for substantial information, facts and figures, verified by me, from the National Boot and Shoe Manufacturers' Association of the United States, which I am making use of in great part, word for word, in my remarks here. A conservative estimate of the annual output in the boot and shoe industry is about $400,000,000, at least one-fourth of which amount is distributed for wages. All that I am asking, and all that the American boot and shoe manufacturers are asking of this Congress, or any other Congress, is a tariff which shall make up the wage differential between the American and foreign wage earner. There are more wage earners employed, and at a higher average wage, in the manufacture of shoes than in any other apparel manufacturing industry, and my earnest desire is that this high standard of wages, maintained by the shoe manufacturers in this country, be continued, but if this bill should become a law it would be impossible for the manufacturers, in my judgment, to continue to pay the wages that they now pay. The American wage earners would be the principal losers. Their interest and welfare is my interest and my welfare, as it should be the interest and welfare of this Congress and all its Members. It is plain that the manufacturers of boots and shoes will not run their factories without they can make a reasonable profit, and when competition from foreign countries necessitates our manufacturers competing with foreign manufacturers, where they pay much less in wages and where they have protection, and our manufacturers will not have, if this bill becomes a law, our standard of wages will be lowered, and the poor people of this country will suffer.

Under the Dingley bill the tariff of 25 per cent upon foreign shoes was no more than sufficient to cover this differential in wages paid in this country over foreign countries, no allowance being made for a profit to the manufacturer.

After the Dingley tariff went into effect, the importation of shoes from foreign countries diminished to a point where the amount imported and the revenue to the country became a negligible quantity.

In the last three years of the Dingley law shoe importations were (for the fiscal year ending June 30 in each year) as follows:

1907	$164,000
1908	129,075
1909	104,925

The superiority of the American shoe, in matter of style and comfortable fit, has commanded this market up to the recent reduction made by the Payne-Aldrich tariff law, which went into effect in August, 1909.

The art of shoe manufacturing in foreign countries had not been at a standstill during the operation of the Dingley tariff law. The foreign manufacturers had adopted American shoe machinery, American lasts, and American patterns and styles, and even taken American workmen and American systems into practical application.

It must be borne in mind that the export of the American shoe is barely 3 per cent of the total output. For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1910, the total exportation of boots and shoes amounted to $12,408,575, while the annual production is estimated upward from a minimum of $400,000,000. It is this small percentage of American shoes that must overcome almost prohibitive tariffs in all countries except England. As for example—Canada, 30 per cent; France, per pair, 57 cents to 95 cents; Germany, by weight, about 25 per cent; Belgium, by weight, 27 cents per pound; Austria, by weight, 20 cents per kilo; Italy, by weight, 20 cents per kilo; Japan, 40 per cent.

The present tariffs imposed by the Payne-Aldrich tariff law, viz, of 10 per cent on shoes made of bovine and calf leathers, and 15 per cent on shoes made from other leathers, do not equalize the wages paid in this country with those paid in foreign countries. In order to demonstrate this and to show the effect upon importation of the tariff reduction enacted by the Payne-Aldrich law from 25 per cent to 10 per cent and 15 per cent, which went into effect in August, 1909, let us take the statistics published by the Department of Commerce and Labor (Bureau of Statistics). The following table will give the imports of boots and shoes into the United States from all countries by quarters, beginning with March 31, 1909, which will include about seven months before the operation of the Payne-Aldrich law.

Quarter ending—	Class.	Rate of duty.	Value.
1909.		Per ct.
Mar. 31	Boots and shoes	25	$26,038.27
June 30	do	25	25,804.10
July 1 to Aug. 5	do	25	15,013.19
Aug. 6 to Sept. 30	Boots and shoes, made wholly, etc., from cattle hides, etc	10	7,410.55
	All other	15	4,500.02
Dec. 31	Boots and shoes, made wholly, etc., from cattle hides, etc	10	25,156.43
	All other	15	16,820.85
1910.
Mar. 31	Boots and shoes, made wholly, etc., from cattle hides, etc	10	31,603.05
	All other	15	16,097.25
June 30	Boots and shoes, made wholly, etc., from cattle hides, etc	10	34,763.00
	All other	15	20,409.51
Sept. 30	Boots and shoes, made wholly, etc., from cattle hides, etc	10	56,934.75
	All other	15	20,238.85
Dec. 31	Boots and shoes, made wholly, etc., from cattle hides, etc	10	66,111.15
	All other	15	34,208.73

The total imports for the quarter ending December 31, 1910, of $100,319 is almost equal to the total imports for the year ending June 30, 1909, which amounted to $104,924.74, while the imports of shoes made from bovine and calf leathers, now subject to 10 per cent duty, for six months, of $123,045.90 is more than the total importations of all kinds of shoes for the entire year ending June 30, 1909, by about $20,000.

It is in these grades of shoes that free trade is proposed.

Those not affected would be a small proportion of the shoe product.

The figures showing the total imports for the quarter ending March 31, 1911, according to information received from the Department of Commerce and Labor, Bureau of Statistics, can not be had for several months. We predict, however, that these figures will show a still larger ratio of increase in the importation of shoes into the United States than has been shown.

The foreign shoe manufacturer is also gaining in his own country as against the American shoe by reason of foreign prohibitive tariffs and diligent enterprise, as indicated by the Bureau of Statistics in its reports of exports to those countries, more particularly to those invading this market.

This bill, which does not seem to, and could not have been framed upon intelligent ideas of tariff and wage conditions in foreign countries as compared with those that obtain in the United States, proposes to place upon the free list all shoes made of bovine and calf leathers. In other words, it is proposed to divide this market in respect to that class of shoes with the shoe manufacturers of the world.

Judging from the impetus given the importation of shoes by the tariff reductions provided by the Payne-Aldrich bill, it can be very easily argued that no further encouragement need be held out to the foreign shoe manufacturer. The only effect which free trade in this class of shoes can produce in the United States would be to compel a reduction of wages to meet the increased competition. The consumer would not procure shoes cheaper.

The United States thus far has been the market of 97 per cent of the shoe output of the American manufacturer, canvassed under the strongest competitive conditions and at an average profit to the manufacturer as low as safe business principles permitted.

Every shoe imported displaces an American shoe and deprives the American workman of the wage involved.

Consul Joseph I. Brittain, of Prague, from a report prepared for him by an American expert superintending the installation of American shoe machinery in a large factory in Bohemia, among other things, says, "Wages here for making shoes are about one-fifth those paid in the United States," and gives the following note of warning in this expert's report—which is on file at the Bureau of Manufactures:

> It is interesting to watch the gradual, but sure, approach to the American shoe upon the trade here, which is continually improving. It is upon this point I wish to sound a warning to exporters and prospective exporters not to hold European conditions too lightly. One year ago I could have taken my place at the head of American scoffers in this respect, but six months' actual contact has opened my eyes to the danger that lies here to American trade when these people shake off their prejudice against our styles and come into our market and buy our lasts and patterns wholesale. A large American company is already here, and either manufactures its whole line of machinery here or has its stock in a central city in the Continent, with a host of as well-trained agents and instructors as we can boast of in the United States. Then there is the duty on American-made shoes, very high and still increasing, while the duties on supplies and leathers from the United States are comparatively low. (NOTE V.—The Department of Commerce and Labor, Weekly Consulate and Trade Reports, published April 30, 1910, Serial No. 9, at page 404.)

If a comparison of the wages paid in foreign countries is made with the wages paid in the United States in the manufacture of boots and shoes, the handicap of the American shoe in the matter of the labor cost of production will demonstrate that, with the present tariff of 10 per cent, the shoe-manufacturing business is in jeopardy. What will happen to the industry if this tariff is wiped out?

It would seem that no more convincing demonstration that the American market is now open to successful exploitation of the foreign shoe can be made than the rapidly increasing volume of importations since August, 1909, the date when the Payne-Aldrich 10 per cent and 15 per cent tariff on shoes went into effect.

Free trade in shoes, as proposed by this bill, will prove calamitous to an American industry which has marketed its product to the consumer at as low a price as received for a similar article anywhere upon the face of the earth, and it will bring confusion into an industry that has been developed with intelligence and diligence to a degree of efficiency not attained by any other industry by compelling a general reduction in the wages paid to its workingmen.

This will all result without any benefit to the consumer or compensatory benefit to the manufacturer, and it will offer the American market for unrestrained competition with the shoe manufacturers of the world. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, I recognize the absolute futility of submitting amendments or even an argument on any question during the discussion of this bill, but I would be derelict to the interests of the district which I have the honor to represent if I did not call attention to some pertinent facts and figures in connection with the provisions affecting the shoe industry.

I heartily favor the amendment offered by my colleague from Missouri [Mr. DYER].

I am opposed to every line of this bill which provides for the free admission of manufactured articles which we can and do produce ourselves. I am opposed to free trade with all the world and with countries paying their workmen but one-third or one-half the wages which American workmen receive for producing these same articles. I am for protection because of the difference in the wage scale between this country and the countries of Europe and Asia, and because I want to see the American laboring man protected against the calamity of being degraded to the level of the poorly paid European wage slave, of the Mexican peon, or the Asiatic coolie. If this bill ever became a law, its inevitable result would be either the lowering of American wages in the affected industries to the European or Asiatic level or the total ruin of these industries and the complete shutting down of hundreds of American manufacturing establishments. This bill will give employment to outside labor and will lock out American labor. And it would be a very shortsighted view to assume that the manufacturers and their employees would be the only sufferers, for in truth their losses would fall upon the farmers with the same crushing force, for the simple reason that the men employed in the factories are the farmers' most numerous customers.

I have made no calculation as to how many men would be injuriously affected by this ill-timed attempt at opening up the American markets to the competition of Europe and Asia, but surely there will be hundreds of thousands of them, and to paralyze the purchasing power of such multitudes is bound to have the effect of bringing down prices for farm products to figures which in turn will paralyze the purchasing power of the farmer. When this point is reached a crisis will be upon us the same as caused the carnival of rags under the Cleveland administration, as a result of the last tariff bill which the Democratic Party had the power to enact. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The effect of the pending bill on the great city which I have the honor, in part, to represent will be most disastrous. It will close three cotton-bagging factories entirely and will seriously cripple, if not wipe out entirely, the great shoe industry, of which, because of its great and growing dimensions, the people of St. Louis are justly proud. Let me give you some figures to show the certain effects this legislation will have on that industry.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 minutes more.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I will state that as there were two gentlemen on that side who wanted to be heard, I was willing to extend the debate 10 minutes. The other gentleman has spoken, and I ask that the gentleman from Missouri may, by unanimous consent, have 5 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the gentleman from Missouri be allowed to proceed for 5 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I thank the House for its courtesy. Two years ago the tariff on shoes was reduced from 25 to 15 and 10 per cent; now it is proposed to put shoes on the free list.

The average duty on wearing apparel is about 60 per cent—

	Per cent.
Hats	50 to 60
Handkerchiefs	50 to 60
Shirts	60
Underwear	55
Clothing, including all kinds of garments	50 to 60
Hosiery	55 to 60
Shoes	10 to 15

In all fairness and justice the duty on shoes ought to be increased, rather than annulled.

The low duty, as it stands to-day, is a penalizing of an industry in which, above all other industries, there has been free and open competition.

The individual earnings of the American shoe worker are not high. As a matter of fact, shoe manufacturers everywhere find difficulty in keeping up their labor supply, in competition with other lines of industry. The last completed Government report shows that in 1905 there were employed 149,924 shoe workers, with total annual wages of $69,059,680. This is exactly $460 a year, which means $1.40 per day, $8.40 per week, or $38.33 a month—surely a moderate wage scale.

The following wage scale is taken from consular reports. It represents the average cost of production of a medium grade men's welt shoe:

	Per case.
England	$27.73
France	22.20
Germany	21.90
Austria	21.70
United States	49.11

In proposing to take the duty off of shoes it opens the American market to foreign competition, while at the same time many of these foreign countries maintain a high protective duty against American-made shoes. The duty in Canada on shoes is 30 per cent; Mexico, 39 cents to $1.50 per pair; France, 57 to 95 cents per pair; Germany (estimated), 20 per cent; Belgium, 27 cents per pound; Austria, 20 cents a kilo; Italy, 20 cents a kilo; Russia (estimated), $1 per pound; Spain (estimated), $1 per pound; Argentina, 40 per cent; Bolivia, 45 per cent; Japan, 40 per cent; Australia, 40 per cent; and United States, 10 to 15 per cent.

The foreign manufacturer has in a large measure access to many materials which enter into the construction of shoes, which materials are in many instances free of duty, whereas the American producer has to reckon with a tariff on many of these articles.

In the United States shoe manufacturers are confronted with a royalty paid to the United States Shoe Machinery Co., which company controls the shoe-machinery market and exacts a tribute from every pair of shoes.

Thus, the American shoe manufacturer, if shoes are placed on the free list, will find himself in the unenviable position of competing with British and other foreign makers who have every advantage in free materials, nonroyalty machinery, and wages at about half what our people are compelled to pay.

It has been said that when the shoe manufacturers appeared before the Ways and Means Committee two years ago, at the time the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill was under discussion, some shoe manufacturer stated that if hides were put on the free list the tariff might be taken off of shoes. If such statement was made, the facts do not warrant it; neither is there any evidence to prove that such statement was authorized by any representative body of shoe manufacturers. On the contrary, many shoe manufacturers protested at the time that lowering the duty from 25 to 15 and 10 per cent was too close to the danger line.

Since the duties have been lowered on shoes the importations of same have begun in larger quantities, and there is every evidence that we shall soon witness a steady and increased import of footwear. If this be true, what will happen if the last vestige of the remaining small protection of 10 per cent be removed? Shall we handicap our own people? Shall we expose them, bound and shackled by unequal opportunities, to the tender mercies of British and other foreign competitors? Are we here to cripple and probably strike down one of our most important industries? English trade papers are teeming with reports and articles about the preparations British shoe manufacturers are making to invade our markets, and this is going on right now under a 10 per cent tariff. What, then, will happen when this last measure of protection is removed? In Missouri, especially St. Louis, I have seen this great industry grow from small beginnings until now my State ranks fourth among the States in the production of shoes, employing some 20,000 people and paying out annually many millions of dollars in wages. No trust, no combination, no "gentleman's agreement," has ever tarnished the bright escutcheon of this peerless industry.

I am proud of the record my State and my people have made in the manufacture of shoes, and I say to my Democratic colleagues, beware what you are doing when you propose to injure and possibly destroy an industry which is one of the most important in your State.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 2, after line 24, by inserting as a new paragraph, the following:

"The articles named in the last preceding paragraph shall be admitted free only when imported into the United States from a country, dependency, province, or colony, being the product thereof, which imposes no tax or duty or restrictive regulation upon the importation into such country, dependency, province, or colony, from the United States, of live, domestic animals, fresh or refrigerated, and prepared or preserved meats, wheat, rye, oats, barley, buckwheat, corn or maize, cottonseed oil."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane to the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. HAY). The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting, on page 2, after line 24, as a new paragraph, the following:

"Tannic acid and tannin."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting on page 2, after line 24, as a new paragraph, the following:

"Extracts and decoctions of logwood and other dyewoods and extracts of bark, such as are commonly used for dyeing or tanning, not specially provided for by law; extracts of quebracho, extracts of hemlock bark, extracts of sumac, and of woods not specially provided for by law; and all extracts of vegetable origin, suitable for tanning, not containing alcohol and not medicinal, and not specially otherwise provided for by law."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask to be heard on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the bill proposes to take from the free list leather. There is now upon the free list hides. This bill puts upon the free list leather. Now, I have offered an amendment to put upon the free list tanning extracts by which hides are converted into leather. There is now on the dutiable list quebracho, which is imported in large quantities from Argentine, upon which the rate of duty is, I believe, one-half or three-quarters of a cent per pound. I have offered an amendment to put that upon the free list, so that out of free hides leather may be made here on even terms with its manufacture in foreign countries, where there is no tariff upon tanning extracts. It seems to me that that amendment is certainly germane to the proposition in the bill to put leather on the free list.

If you put leather on the free list, is it not in order at the same time to offer to put upon the free list those materials out of which leather is made? Suppose hides were not upon the free list and there was in this bill a proposition, as there is, to put leather on the free list. Would it not be in order to move to amend by placing hides on the free list, out of which leather is made? Will it be contended that in a bill to put the manufactured products on the free list you can not amend it by putting the raw material on the free list as germane to the proposition? It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that this amendment is not at all like the amendment ruled upon by the gentleman who has occupied the chair before the present occupant of the chair went into the chair. I would not ask the present occupant of the chair upon an argument to overrule the regular presiding officer of this committee. I think there is a distinction in this.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair, following the reasoning of the permanent occupant of the chair, sustains the point of order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 2, after line 24, by inserting as a new paragraph the following:

"Boot, shoe, and corset lacings made of cotton or other vegetable fiber."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that is not germane.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, do I understand that you could put shoes on the free list and that you can not put shoe laces on at the same time?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think it is as different an article as sugar or any other article. It is not a part of boots and shoes.

Mr. MANN. You can not sell a pair of shoes without shoe laces.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That may be so.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 2, after line 24, by inserting as a new paragraph the following:

"Dolls, and parts of dolls, doll heads, toy marbles of whatever materials composed, and all other toys, and parts of toys, not composed of china, porcelain, parian, bisque, earthen or stone ware, and not specially provided for by law."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Barbed fence wire, wire rods, wire strands or wire rope, wire woven or manufactured for wire fencing, and other kinds of wire suitable for fencing, including wire staples.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 3, after line 3, by inserting as a new paragraph, the following:

"Provided, That the articles mentioned in this paragraph shall be admitted free only when imported from a country, dependency, province, or colony, being the products thereof, which imposes no tax or duty on like articles imported from the United States, and which imposes no tax or duty or restrictive regulation upon the importation into such country, dependency, province, or colony, from the United States, of live, domestic animals, fresh or refrigerated and prepared or preserved meats, wheat, rye, oats, barley, buckwheat, corn or maize, cottonseed oil."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the paragraph is not germane to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer a further amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 3, by inserting after line 3, as a new paragraph, the following:

"Sheets or plates of iron or steel, or taggers iron or steel, coated with tin or lead, or with a mixture of which these metals, or either of them, are a component part, by the dipping or any other process, and commercially known as tin plates, terneplates, and taggers tin."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard on the point of order. The bill proposes to place upon the free list meats prepared or preserved in any manner. I take it that places on the free list canned meats. Now, what is the amendment I have offered? To give the people of this country who can meats free tin plate or cans, so that they may compete on even terms with the canners abroad.

Mr. HEFLIN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MANN. I will.

Mr. HEFLIN. Would the gentleman like to see this amendment adopted?

Mr. MANN. I would.

Mr. HEFLIN. If the amendment is adopted will the gentleman vote for the bill?

Mr. MANN. I will not.

Mr. HEFLIN. I thought so.

Mr. MANN. There is nothing hard about that. I do not propose to vote for this bill in any event, I say to the gentleman. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HOBSON. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. HOBSON. If all the amendments the gentleman has offered were united into a separate bill would he vote for that bill?

Mr. MANN. I would not; no hesitation about that at all; but I have not been attempting to delude the country into the belief that I was in favor of all these other things like gentlemen on that side of the House, who, when opportunity is presented, back water and let the opportunity go. [Applause on the Republican side.] I am not afraid of my convictions, like the gentleman who just interrupted me. I do not except him specially, because I do not think the gentleman is afraid of his convictions at all——

Mr. HOBSON. Would the gentleman be kind enough to specify to me and to the House, if he is willing, whether there is any amendment he has offered for which as a separate bill he would vote, and if so indicate which, so we may know and the country may know which one he offers in good faith?

Mr. MANN. I have offered all these amendments in good faith. [Laughter on the Democratic side.] I do not desire gentlemen to question my good faith at all. Everything I do in this House is done in good faith. Now, if I had time and gentlemen would give it, I would be very glad to elucidate the amendments, but I have not desired unnecessarily to take up the time of the House.

Mr. FINLEY. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. FINLEY. I understand the gentleman offered the amendments in the firm expectation that the amendments which he offered would not be accepted, and I understand he would not vote for the bill even if they were accepted. Is that correct?

Mr. MANN. I had hoped and believed really in the innocence of my heart that some professions on the Democratic side of the House had been made in good faith, and that when an opportunity came they would agree to some of the amendments offered, but I find I am mistaken.

Mr. FINLEY. Does not the gentleman know—and the gentleman is a prominent Member of this House and has great ability—that the Democrats are the best judges of what is a proper exhibition of faith for this side of the House?

Mr. MANN. I know this, that the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FINLEY] and others can not exercise their individual opinions on the floor of the House on this bill at all, because they bound themselves in every respect tight by caucus action, and what they say will not reflect the opinion of any man on the floor of the House. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. FINLEY. Does not the gentleman know that in the last Congress the Republican party got up a bill and with very few exceptions no amendments were allowed? Now, will the gentleman tell the committee why he voted against the Payne-Aldrich bill? Was it because the duties were too high or too low?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I did what no gentleman on that side of the House seems willing to do. I exercised the right of every American Representative in this Hall to use his individual judgment on matters which are presented before him for his individual judgment. That right will not be exercised by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FINLEY] or anybody else on that side of the House, because they have no individual judgment. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. FINLEY. What was the gentleman's judgment when he voted against the Payne bill?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I renew the point of order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to take the time of the House in this matter.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. MANN. I have no desire, but when gentlemen ask, to interrupt me, I do not like to be put in the position of refusing.

Mr. FINLEY. I would like the gentleman to inform the House and to give us his reason for having voted against that bill.

Mr. MANN. I will ask the gentleman to read the speech which I made in the House when the conference report was up. If he wants information, if he will read that speech he will get it.

Mr. FINLEY. I have read that speech, and while I do not accuse the gentleman of dodging I think other people have done so.

Mr. MANN. Well, if they have, I never knew it. That will never bother me. I warned this side of the House what the result would be at that time [applause on the Democratic side], and I warn that side of the House now what the result will be. [Applause on the Republican side.] My prophecy was true then, and it will prove as true now.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I renew the point of order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to carry on this kind of debate if you can keep the men on that side of the House down. I was endeavoring to discuss the point of order, and had completed my statement in reference to that when interrupted by gentlemen who are trying to make cheap capital.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order. The Clerk will read.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer a further amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting on page 3, after line 3, as a new paragraph, the following:

"Cut nails and cut spikes, of iron or steel."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the further amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting on page 3, after line 3, as a new paragraph, the following:

"Horseshoe nails, hob nails, and all other wrought iron or steel nails not specially provided for by law."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting on page 3, after line 3, as a new paragraph, the following:

"Wire nails made of wrought iron or steel."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer a further amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] offers a further amendment, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting on page 3, after line 3, as a new paragraph, the following:

"Horse, mule, or ox shoes, of wrought iron or steel."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Beef, veal, mutton, lamb, pork, and meats of all kinds, fresh, salted, pickled, dried, smoked, dressed or undressed, prepared or preserved in any manner; bacon, hams, shoulders, lard, lard compounds and lard substitutes; and sausage and sausage meats.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado is recognized.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. RUCKER] moves to strike out the paragraph. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman, I offer a preferential amendment—a perfective amendment.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, that is already offered. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman, that before the gentleman offered it it was already offered and voted on.

Mr. NORRIS. It was voted on, and it has gone out of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend page 3, line 8, after the words "sausage and sausage meats," by adding the words "except bologna sausage, which shall be subject to a duty of 3 cents a pound."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane to this paragraph—to amend the taxing clause.

Mr. OLMSTED. Will the gentleman withhold his point of order for a moment? I am offering this in perfect good faith.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I will reserve the point of order.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman, I am offering this amendment at the request and in the interest of constituents of mine in the county of Lebanon, in Pennsylvania, and I am going to read from a letter addressed to me by Walter C. Graeff, Esq., a prominent attorney and citizen of that county, who, after enumerating the bologna sausage manufacturers, a number of whom have called upon me with reference to this matter, says:

You may probably be aware of the fact, and if not, it is at least interesting to note that 90 per cent of the bolognas manufactured in the United States are manufactured right here in Lebanon County by the above-named manufacturers. In this business these men have not only invested a large amount of capital, but the business furnishes employment to a large number of workmen, and some idea of the business can be obtained from the fact that on an average 75 tons of beef is received here from Chicago and worked up into bologna every week.

From the statement that I am about to make at this point let me say that bologna wholesales at from 13 to 14 cents a pound; the cost of manufacture is from 12½ to 13½ cents per pound, depending upon the price of meat. You will notice, therefore, that the margin of profit is small, but the business is profitable even at a small margin of profit on account of its magnitude.

Now, on the more important point: About one year ago Messrs. Ray T. Sherman and John S. Weaver, with probably good business foresight, conceived the idea of building a plant in Mexico, across the Rio Grande, in the city of Juarez, in the State of Chihuahua, cattle being plentiful and labor cheap and there being no tariff on bologna—the manufacture of bologna not having probably been brought to the attention of Congress at the time the tariff bill was framed. These gentlemen will unquestionably be able to ship their product into the United States, even as far as Lebanon County, and sell at a profit below the cost of manufacture of the article here in Lebanon County. You can be perfectly sure of this statement by reason of the fact that Mr. Ray T. Sherman was at one time a partner with Mr. Albert Herr, and Mr. Weaver was at one time in the bologna business here at Lebanon, and Herr and Eby are sure of the facts.

In order therefore to protect this home industry, which is indeed an important one in Lebanon County, a tariff on bologna, in view of this situation, becomes absolutely necessary.

It strikes me that I could call to your attention that no objection could be raised to this request from the standpoint of increasing the cost of food products, for without the tariff these gentlemen have not endeavored to create artificial prices for their product, and as long as they were not met by foreign competition they were able to sell their goods at the margin of profit that I mentioned above and still furnish them to the householder at a reasonable price. A tariff therefore of not less than 3 nor more than 4 cents a pound would not result in increasing the cost of the article to the consumer at all, but would simply save these industries from annihilation.

The letter is signed.

WALTER C. GRAEFF.

(For Robert L. Eby, Albert Herr, George T. Brooks, Benjamin Kreider, Harvey Seltzer, Lebanon County Bologna Manufacturers.)

It will be noticed that he states that two or three of the people of that county have gone to Mexico, to Juarez, where cattle are cheap and labor is cheap, and they are now making bologna sausage and shipping it in here at prices that will annihilate the business in the United States. This bill does not put cattle on the free list. It leaves the duty on the raw material and puts the manufactured article on the free list. The effect of putting or leaving bologna sausage on the free list is to give the manufacturers in Mexico an advantage over the manufacturers in this country. The duty of 3 cents a pound proposed by my amendment is not more than sufficient for the fair protection of this industry. I thank the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] for his courtesy in reserving the point of order and hope that he will reserve it altogether, so that we may have a vote directly upon the amendment. It may not be in order to impose duties in this bill, but it can be done if the point of order is not pressed.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment. I move, Mr. Chairman, that debate be closed on the paragraph and——

Mr. KENDALL. A number of amendments are yet to be offered.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I move, Mr. Chairman, that all debate on the paragraph and amendments thereto be closed in 10 minutes.

Mr. MANN. A number of gentlemen desire to be heard on this, and legitimately.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is getting late, Mr. Chairman, and although I am willing to give a reasonable time, yet I am constrained to move that debate on the paragraph and all amendments thereto be closed in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama moves that debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend that motion by inserting "30 minutes" in place of "10 minutes."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] moves to amend the motion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] by striking out "ten" and inserting "thirty." The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. MANN. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 62, noes 93.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chairman appointed Mr. MANN and Mr. UNDERWOOD.

Mr. MANN. I ask that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN] act in my place as one of the tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 74, noes 116.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out "ten" and inserting "twenty."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves to amend the motion of the gentleman from Alabama by striking out "ten" and inserting "twenty."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that motion is dilatory.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] appeals from the decision of the Chair. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Committee?

The question being taken; on a division there were—ayes 106, noes 75.

Mr. MANN. I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chairman oppointed Mr. MANN and Mr. UNDERWOOD.

Mr. MANN. I ask that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN] act in my place as one of the tellers.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I ask that the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON] act in my place as one of the tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 118, noes 78.

Accordingly the decision of the Chair was sustained.

The announcement of the result was received with applause on the Democratic side.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the motion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] to limit the debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto to 10 minutes.

The question being taken, the Chairman announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. MANN. I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 120, noes 56.

Accordingly, the motion of Mr. UNDERWOOD was agreed to.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 8, after the word "meats," add the following:

"Provided, That beef, veal, mutton, lamb, pork, and other meats stipulated in this section of the bill and which are produced in the United States shall be admitted free of duty into the country or countries, dependency or dependencies which import like articles into this country."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I make the point of order against that amendment that it is not germane.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting before line 4, on page 3:

"The following articles, the growth, product, or manufacture of the Dominion of Canada."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make the same point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out, on page 3, in lines 4 to 8, inclusive, the following:

"Beef, veal, mutton, lamb, pork, and meats of all kinds, fresh, salted, pickled, dried, smoked, dressed or undressed, prepared or preserved in any manner; bacon, hams, shoulders, lard, lard compounds and lard substitutes; and sausage and sausage meats."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Oklahoma that the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. RUCKER] has already offered that amendment.

Mr. MORGAN. I would like to be heard on that point.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, does the Chair recognize me to speak on the amendment or on the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. No point of order has been made to the amendment.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, I want to say a few words why I think this amendment should be adopted. The gentlemen who stand as the authors of the bill and those who believe in a tariff for revenue only maintain this theory, viz: That by removing the duty on an article the price of the article will be reduced accordingly. I do not myself believe this theory, as I maintain that many other elements have an influence upon, and often control, the prices. Especially is this true in these days of concentration of business. This bill contains two classes of articles. One class includes manufactured articles which the farmer uses and purchases. Among these may be mentioned farm implements, fence wire, boots and shoes, sewing machines, cotton ties and cotton bagging, lumber, and salt. The other class includes articles that are manufactured out of farm products. Prominent among these articles are beef, veal, mutton, lamb, pork, and meats of all kinds, flour, meal, oatmeal, cereal foods, and bread. It has been stated here this afternoon, it has been stated many times in the discussion of this measure, that the very object of this bill was to reduce the cost of living by reducing the cost of these articles which are manufactured out of farm products. Now then, if you reduce the prices of these articles that are manufactured out of farm products, you must reduce the price of the farm products out of which they are manufactured.

The Committee on Ways and Means furnished us a table showing the amount of consumption of the various articles that are included in this bill. If we assume that the theory of the gentlemen who advocate a tariff for revenue only and who have presented this bill for our consideration is correct, namely, that the price of the article is increased by the amount of the tariff and that by placing the article on the free list the price of the article will be reduced accordingly, but which I do not concede, then we can by a simple process of mathematical calculation ascertain how much the farmers will gain by a reduction in the price of these articles which they buy and how much they will lose by a reduction in the price of the articles that are manufactured out of the products of the farm, which they must sell. I have made the calculation, using the ad valorem rate for 1910, and the consumption of these articles in the year 1905. I find that, under this theory, the farmers would buy these manufactured articles at an annual gain of one hundred and fifty-eight million, by reason of the reduction in the price. Assuming we have 6,000,000 farmers this would make an annual saving to each farmer of $19.

By the same process of calculation there would be a loss to the farmers in one year by reducing the price of farm products of $292,000,000, or a loss of $48 annually to every farmer. While there might be a reduction upon manufactured articles of $158,000,000, there would be a reduction of $292,000,000 on farm products, making by this bill a net loss to the farmers of the United States of $134,000,000 annually. I do not myself believe this is a true basis for determining the gains and losses to the farmers should this bill become a law, but I desire that this bill shall be so amended as to insure that we shall not injure the farmers by reducing the value of farm products.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, there are several distinguishing features about this amendment. One is that it is about the most unpopular amendment that has been offered here to-day. Another is it is the only one that has been or will be offered on this side of the Chamber. Another is that it is offered by about the most unpopular fellow, just at this time, on this side of the House. [Laughter.] Another distinguishing feature is that it will get only one vote on this side of the House, and that will be mine. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, the day of the cattle baron is past. The farmer is now raising the cattle that come to our markets, and it is the farmer I am speaking for here to-day, together with the few stock growers left who are now making a living. The time has passed when you could drive cattle from Texas to Chicago or Kansas City and put them upon the block and have them as fat when they landed as when they started. I remember the time when a boy I drove cattle from Missouri to Chicago, swimming them across the Missouri River, the Mississippi River, and the Illinois River, and then getting them to the block across the grazing lands as fat as they were when they started.

That time has gone, however, and I agree with my friends on this side that the only reason for the passage of this bill is that it will undoubtedly cheapen the cost of living. That is also a distinguishing feature. There is no disguise of that fact, as is well known to the farmer and stock grower; so far as they are concerned there is no deception. There is no escape from the fact that it will cost less to buy beefsteaks than it has heretofore, but it is also apparent that it is at the cost of the farmer and stock grower.

It is not worth while to pay any attention to the pork meat and products thereof mentioned in the paragraph, because we all know we are not importers of such meats or products.

The number of beeves now exported to Europe is negligible. The only country in the world now shipping beef upon the hoof to Europe is Canada. Canada shipped three years ago $11,000,000 worth of cattle from the grass pastures, but her exports are growing less and less every year on account of the exports of frozen meats from Australia, New Zealand, and Argentina. And those countries have likewise reduced our exports, as I will show. Mr. Chairman, this country is shipping its frozen meats only to Europe. New Zealand is doing the same thing, and so is Argentina. The whole business of meat supply of the country is now in frozen meats, and I have some figures which show how this important trade has fallen off to our section of the country. Of fresh meats five years ago we sent $22,000,000 and over to Europe. Last year we only sent $12,000,000 there. Why was this? Let me tell you.

Argentina sent, in 1909, over $32,000,000 worth to Europe, and it had sent five years before only $7,000,000 worth. This enormous multiplication is something which has driven out the export trade from this country, and it was during the year 1909 that New Zealand shipped over $17,000,000 more than she had five years ago. Gentlemen upon this side are looking through the wrong end of the telescope or they would see that it was the great trusts of this country that make the cost of living higher to those who live in the cities, but the farmer is not getting the benefit of the high prices.

Why not turn the dogs of war loose upon these trusts instead of raining blows after blows upon the innocent heads of the farmer and stock grower? [Applause.]

These trusts already have their plants in the countries mentioned, and it is their meat that is going to the foreign markets, and with free meats from abroad they will bring the frozen here. They will also establish plants in Mexico, and by these arrangements our stock growers will be put out of business. The duty upon beef is now 1½ cents a pound. This means the farmer and stock raiser who has a steer dressing 1,000 pounds must sell that steer for $15 less under the provisions of this bill. This is a stupendous blunder on our part and a monumental outrage against the farmer and stock grower. That you have not seen clearly, that your perspective is at fault, is clearly visible to the eyes of that great army of farmers and stock growers who are looking from the far-away farms and plains upon your action here to-day.

And now, in closing, I feel like giving you an illustration of what you are doing, or, at any rate, appear to be doing. On one occasion, when out on the plains camping, on one of our round-ups, in the early morning I heard the cackle of some sage hens close by. I hollered to the cook that it was time for breakfast, and he should go out and get one of them for breakfast. He arose, and I heard several shots fired, but when I went to breakfast I did not see anything of the sage hen. I asked him why it was absent; he said he did not see any sage hen. "What on earth, then," I said, "were you doing all that shooting about?" He replied that he thought he was shooting at a sage hen, and found after the third fire he was aiming at a "darned louse" on his eyebrow. [Laughter and loud applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. I ask unanimous consent for one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Colorado.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. NORRIS, Mr. KENDALL, Mr. LANGLEY, and others. Division!

The CHAIRMAN. The noes have it, and the amendment is rejected. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk began reading.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MORGAN. What became of my motion to amend?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman that the amendment of the gentleman from Oklahoma and the amendment of the gentleman from Colorado were identical, and the amendment of the gentleman from Colorado was pending when he offered his amendment.

Mr. MORGAN. Another inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the RECORD show that I offered this amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. Why, of course.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, a division was demanded. I raise a point of order that a division was demanded by several gentlemen.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not hear it.

Mr. NORRIS. There was much confusion in the room when there was a demand for a division.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point that there was no gentleman on his feet demanding a division, but there was simply a call for a division, and that is not sufficient to entitle a Member to a division.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Chair declines to entertain the demand for a division, let us have it in the RECORD that he has.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 3, after line 8, by inserting as a new paragraph the following:

"The provisions of the last preceding paragraph shall not apply to articles imported from any country, dependency, province, or colony, or other subdivision of government, which imposes any tax or duty or restrictive regulation upon the importation into such country from the United States of any meats of any kind whatever, either fresh or preserved in any form, or of flour, live cattle, or cotton-seed oil, or which prohibits or restricts in any way the exportation of news print paper, wood pulp, or pulp wood."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MANN. I desire to offer another amendment.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, my judgment tells me that tariff modification should await the report of the Tariff Commission. I believe so now. I believed so when a few days ago I spoke and voted against the proposed agreement with Canada. Nearly all my Democratic friends voted for that measure. Nearly half of the Republicans supported it. That measure is now before the Senate.

The present bill is an illy considered measure, but it is a sort of companion piece to the other, and I believe it should be considered with it. In the other you have struck a blow at our agricultural interests—our farmers, who raise grain, and our growers of sheep and cattle.

We should not make fish of one and fowl of another, and I believe that protection to the producer of the finished product should be considered at the same time that protection to the agriculturist is considered. So much for that. If our Democratic friends will accept any reasonable amendment to this bill, touching the product of the farm, I shall vote with them to send this bill to the Senate.

I desire now to offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read. It is to be inserted as a paragraph following the paragraph which has just been read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "meats," at the end of line 8, page 3, insert:
"Provided, That the provisions of the preceding paragraph shall apply only to the Dominion of Canada."

Mr. FITZGERALD. A point of order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against that.

Mr. FRENCH. Will the gentleman withhold the point of order a moment?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. All debate has been closed on the paragraph.

Mr. FITZGERALD. We have had debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer a further amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 3, by inserting after line 8, as a new paragraph, the following:
"This act shall not be construed to admit into the United States free of duty animal stearin or any other substance principally used in the manufacture of oleomargarine or other substitute for butter."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against that.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard on the point of order. It is just as well for the Chair to give an opportunity to be heard. The bill provides for the admission of beef, veal, mutton, lamb, pork, and meats of all kinds, dressed or undressed, and so forth. Does that cover the whole side of the beef or not? Can anybody tell whether it does or not? Will the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] say whether it does or not?

Now, I have offered an amendment to provide that that shall not be construed to admit into the United States animal stearin out of which oleomargarine is made. No one can tell from the reading of the bill whether you can bring in the side of a beef with the animal stearin still there or not. It seems to me that the amendment which I offer is clearly in order as further defining the meaning of the language in the bill, and providing that Argentina shall not be allowed to ship to the United States stearin for the manufacture of oleomargarine in competition with our dairy products.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD].

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to take up the time of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. MANN. I ask for a division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 66, noes 106.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer a further amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 3, after line 8, by inserting as a new paragraph the following:
"Rice, cleaned or uncleaned, with or without the hull on."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against that.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard on the point of order. The bill proposes to admit free buckwheat flour, corn meal, wheat flour and semolina, and rye flour, and all prepared cereal foods, and so forth. Now I have offered an amendment to put rice on the free list. Rice, as the Chair well knows, comes in daily competition with these other articles as a matter of consumption in the home. To say that you can put wheat on the free list and wheat flour on the free list, or prepared cereal foods on the free list, but can not put in the same connection rice, that comes in competition with them in the homes, on the free list, is to absolutely cut off the liberty of amendment.

As the Chair will remember, the Quaker Oats Co. not only makes oatmeal for sale, but makes Puffed Rice for sale, which I hope the Chair occasionally enjoys, and hence must know that the prepared rice is put upon the free list. I wish to put the raw material on the free list, out of which Puffed Rice is made.

Mr. TILSON. May I ask the gentleman a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Connecticut?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. TILSON. Where is rice grown principally? Of course, I ask for information.

Mr. MANN. Rice grows outside of the United States principally and is a cheap article of food much desired in the United States, and is left out of this bill for the benefit of the few districts in the South. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer a further amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, by inserting on page 3, after line 8, as a new paragraph, the following:
"Olive oil."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer a further amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers a further amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 3, after line 8, by inserting as a new paragraph, the following:
"Cattle, subject, however, to the provisions of section 12 of the so-called Payne tariff law."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I did not understand the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk again reported the amendment.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman, that that is not germane.

Mr. MANN. I desire, Mr. Chairman, to be heard upon the point of order.

The bill proposes to admit free of duty cattle when manufactured into meat, and certainly it is in order, therefore, in that connection to put the raw material, cattle, on the free list. Under what principle can it be contended that, if you kill the cattle and cut them up and admit the parts free, it is not in order to offer an amendment to let the cattle come in before they are killed and cut up? That, Mr. Chairman, is all I desire to say. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer a further amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 3, after line 8, by inserting as a new paragraph the following:
"Horses and mules."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer a further amendment. No; I think that comes in afterwards.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Buckwheat flour, corn meal, wheat flour and semolina, rye flour, bran, middlings and other offals of grain, oatmeal and rolled oats, and all prepared cereal foods; and biscuits, bread, wafers, and similar articles not sweetened.

Mr. MANN. Now, Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 3, line 10, by inserting after the word "flour" the words "rice flour and rice meal."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that is not germane.

Mr. MANN. The Chair has already ruled that an amendment putting in rice is in order, and this is an amendment putting rice flour on the free list, along with other flours. I think it is clearly in order.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I do not think rice flour is in order under this paragraph. It is separate from the flour mentioned here.

Mr. MANN. If it was held in order to put rice on the free list, it ought to be in order to put rice flour on the free list.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that the paragraph deals with flours generally, and the point of order is overruled.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, has the Clerk read through line 12?

The CHAIRMAN. He has.

Mr. MURDOCK. I offer the following, then.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois has the floor.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, there were 129,000,000 pounds of rice flour and rice meal imported into the United States in the last fiscal year, which paid a duty of one-fourth of a cent a pound. This bill proposes to place on the free list wheat flour, rye flour, and oatmeal. It proposes to place upon the free list other grains when they are ground, but to leave ground rice, which is one of the main articles of consumption, on the dutiable list. One hundred and twenty-nine million pounds of rice flour were imported in the last fiscal year, paying a duty. What excuse can there be for not putting rice flour on the free list when you put wheat flour on the free list, unless it be that wheat flour is produced from a grain raised in the North and rice flour is produced from a grain raised in the South?

Mr. PUJO. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MANN. I defy anybody to give any other reason. [Prolonged applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, the reason why rice flour is not placed in this bill has been made very apparent by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. He states that there is a very large importation of rice flour into this country, and that it raises a very considerable amount of revenue——

Mr. MANN. Amounting to $324,000.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is the reason we could not put everything on the free list. The reason why many other things have not been placed on the free list in this bill is because of the necessary loss of revenue.

Mr. GARNER. And the extravagance of the Republican Party.

Mr. PAYNE. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is only on account of the loss of revenue that the distinction is drawn.

I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that this does not complete our tariff legislation. As I stated in the beginning, we introduced this bill for a specific purpose, to give to the farmers of this country their agricultural implements and tools free of duty and to give to the people of the cities their meat and bread free of duty. We could not go beyond that without endangering the revenue. For that reason we have not at this time put all the things on the free list that we could.

Mr. PAYNE. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I can not yield right now. We intend, when the proper time comes, to take up these various schedules and revise them properly.

Mr. MANN. There is no time like the present.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, yes, there is.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I move that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto be now closed. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. WARBURTON. Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. WARBURTON. I want to ask the gentleman from Alabama if he will withhold his request for a moment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will be recognized in a moment, if he wishes to offer an amendment. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] to close all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto.

The question being taken, the Chairman announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. MANN. I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 130, noes 72.

Accordingly the motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is closed, and the question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The question being taken, the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. MANN. I ask for tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chairman appointed Mr. AUSTIN and Mr. HARRISON.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 94, noes 161.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer a further amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 3, by inserting after the word "oats," in line 11, the following:

"Macaroni, vermicelli."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois.

The question being taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MANN) there were—ayes 81, noes 126.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MANN. I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, by inserting on page 3, after line 12, as a new paragraph, the following:

"Lemons, oranges, limes, grape fruit, shaddocks, or pomelos."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I make the point of order that that is not germane.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MANN. I offer a further amendment.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MURDOCK. Has the committee passed from the consideration of the paragraph which begins with line 9 on page 3 and ends with line 12 on the same page?

The CHAIRMAN. That is what we are now considering.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin is recognized. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Kansas later. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding after the word "grain," in line 10, page 3, the words "linseed meal and linseed oil."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. LENROOT) there were—ayes 85, noes 126.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend line 12, page 3, by striking out the words "not sweetened."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. LENROOT) there were—ayes 81, noes 131.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out, on page 3, lines 9 to 12, inclusive, the following words:

"Buckwheat flour, corn meal, wheat flour and semolina, rye flour, bran, middlings, and other offals of grain, oatmeal and rolled oats, and all prepared cereal foods; and biscuits, bread, wafers, and similar articles not sweetened."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MORGAN) there were—ayes 77, noes 133.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. KENDALL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting after line 12, page 3, as an independent paragraph, the following:

"Sugar, molasses, maple sugar, maple sirup, oranges, lemons, pineapples, and all other tropical fruits."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. KENDALL. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KENDALL. Mr. Chairman, my parliamentary inquiry is to inquire if we might have some idea what disposition was made of the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has sustained the point of order.

Mr. KENDALL. I appeal to the gentleman from Alabama to reserve his point of order—— [Cries of "Regular order!"]

I want to appeal to the gentleman from Alabama to allow us to aid him in reducing the cost of living by removing the duty upon sugar, which is one of the staples.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. MANN (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which I desire to offer which comes in before the next paragraph. The Clerk should stop reading when somebody is addressing the Chair. A new Clerk may be excusable for doing something he does not know anything about.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk was reading by the direction of the Chair. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. I have an amendment that comes in before the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman was not on his feet offering the amendment when the Chair directed the Clerk to read.

Mr. MANN. I beg the Chair's pardon, but I was on my feet addressing the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not see the gentleman. However, the gentleman will send his amendment. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting, on page 3, after line 12, as a new paragraph the following:

"Pineapples in barrels and other packages."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that it is not germane.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, line 11, page 3, after "cereal foods," by inserting "except macaroni, vermicelli, spaghetti, and noodles."

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman, is debate in order?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting, on page 3, after line 12, as a new paragraph, the following:

"Apples, peaches, quinces, cherries, plums, and pears, green or ripe; edible berries in their natural condition; all edible fruits, including berries when dried, desiccated, evaporated, or prepared in any manner, not otherwise specially provided for by law; jellies of all kinds; pineapples preserved in their own juice, not having sugar, spirits, or molasses added thereto."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that it is not germane.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer a further amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting, on page 3, after line 12, as a new paragraph, the following:

"Chicory root, raw, dried, or undried, burnt or roasted, ground or granulated, or in rolls, or otherwise prepared, not otherwise specially provided for by law."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that it is not germane.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer a further amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting, on page 3, after line 12, as a new paragraph, the following:

"Beans, not otherwise specially provided for by law."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that it is not germane.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer a further amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, by inserting on page 3, after line 12, as a new paragraph, the following:

"Vegetables, in their natural state, not specially provided for by law."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I make the point of order that it is not germane.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer a further amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, by inserting on page 3, after line 12, as a new paragraph, the following:

"Peas, green, in bulk or in barrels, sacks, or similar packages, seed peas, peas, dried, not otherwise specially provided for by law, and split peas."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman, it is not germane.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer a further amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, by inserting on page 3, after line 12, as a new paragraph, the following:

"Onions and garlic."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer a further amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, by inserting on page 3, after line 12, as a new paragraph, the following:

"Seeds: Castor beans or seeds, spinach, beet, parsnip, radish, turnip, rutabaga, cabbage, collard, kale, and kohl-rabi seed."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that it is not germane.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer a further amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 3, after line 12, by inserting as a new paragraph the following:

"Eggs, not otherwise specially provided for."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that it is not germane.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer a further amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 3, after line 12, by inserting as a new paragraph the following:

"Coal."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that it is not germane.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Timber, hewn, sided, or squared, round timber used for spars or in building wharves, shingles, laths, fencing posts, sawed boards, planks, deals, and other lumber, rough or dressed, except boards, planks, deals, and other lumber, of lignum-vitæ, lancewood, ebony, box, granadilla, mahogany, rosewood, satinwood, and all other cabinet woods.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 3, by striking out lines 13 to 18, inclusive.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to perfect the paragraph.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, am I recognized for debate now upon the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment to perfect the paragraph.

Mr. LANGLEY. Am not I entitled to be heard upon my amendment at this time?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. ALEXANDER). The gentleman is entitled to speak on his amendment.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, the effect of my motion, if adopted, will be to strike from this bill the provision for free lumber. There are some provisions in this bill that I would like to vote for, and I would vote for them if I had a chance to vote upon them separately. But there are other provisions in it, including the provision for free lumber, that I will not vote for, either standing alone or coupled with other provisions that to me are unobjectionable. I know that my motion to strike out this free-lumber provision will be voted down, but I want to take advantage of the opportunity to enter my protest against it. I have had occasion heretofore to give my reasons for opposing free lumber. I have done so once during the present session, when the Canadian reciprocity treaty was under consideration, and I also gave my reasons for opposing it when the Payne tariff bill was under consideration in the last Congress, and it is useless for me to seek to detain the committee by going over the same ground again. But I will say, gentlemen, that if this paragraph is enacted into law, it will do great damage to one of the most important industries in this country. That industry is important to the people of my district; it is important to the people of other sections of Kentucky; it is important to the people of many other States of this Union.

Hundreds of millions of dollars are invested in the lumber industry, and many thousands of men are employed in it. If this bill becomes a law in its present shape, and it does not do any damage to the lumber industry of the United States, then I promise you now that I will later on in this Congress, or in the next Congress, apologize to the House for having uselessly consumed its time in opposing a provision that was not detrimental to that industry and for making a prophesy that was not fulfilled.

I shall not detain the committee further. I am glad that the Democratic Party is at last going squarely on record in this House as favoring free lumber, and that my Democratic colleagues from Kentucky are going on record for free lumber as against my Republican colleague and myself, who are opposing it. You, gentlemen, on the other side of the House—and I regret to say that a few of my own party associates are joining with you—are proposing by enacting this provision to do injury to one of the greatest industries in this country.

That is all, Mr. Chairman, that I care to say now upon the subject, but I will discuss it further before the people of Kentucky later on. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto do now close.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to that. I would like to make a parliamentary inquiry. Has the rule which has always obtained here of recognizing members of the committee reporting the bill, when they ask for recognition, been abrogated?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is not aware of any rule having been abrogated.

Mr. PAYNE. Now, I want to move an amendment to the motion of the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] will listen, I will say that if the gentleman from New York desires the floor, he being the senior member of the minority on the Ways and Means Committee, if he will state what time he desires to address the House, I will not cut him off.

Mr. PAYNE. I would like five minutes, as far as I am concerned.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this paragraph close in five minutes.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] moves that all debate on the pending paragraph and amendments thereto close in five minutes, the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] to be recognized for that length of time.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word of this paragraph. Early in the consideration of this bill this morning I asked the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] if the bill had ever been considered anywhere or by any committee. I did not get any answer from him. I asked the question in good faith, because it is perfectly evident that no man who ever knew anything about the tariff ever considered this bill an hour before it was brought in here, inasmuch as it is so full of mistakes and blunders, it is so full of questions that will come up in the customs court before any determination can be made as to how much you have put on the free list.

And then I asked the gentleman again a few minutes ago, when he was discussing the question of rice flour, a question, but he evidently did not want to answer it. He wanted to run away from rice flour. His excuse was that he did not put it on the free list because it cut off a revenue of $324,000. Does not the gentleman know yet that the statement he made in the committee of $1,000,000 was grossly inaccurate as to what the bill would cut out in the way of revenue? Does he not know that his subsequent statement in the committee report that it would cut off $10,000,000 is grossly inaccurate? Does he not know that the statement that was given out to the newspapers afterwards that it would cut off $12,000,000 or $15,000,000 of the revenue was grossly inaccurate?

I can not tell how much it will cut off, but I believe it will approach $50,000,000 if the bill should ever become a law. But of course it never will become a law. It can not bear investigation. It can not bear scrutiny. I do not wonder the gentleman wants to run away. Whenever a question is asked he gets up here with some grandiloquent talk about going to cheapen the high cost of living in this country. We give you an opportunity to cheapen it by taking off the duty on rice flour, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has asked the question, "Is it because that is grown in the South that you do not take off that duty and still you take off the duty on wheat flour—on wheat grown in the North?" You do not get on to his high cost of living on that, but it is a matter of revenue of $325,000 that he is going to lose. So you go on all the way through this bill. Why, I feel now as though I would like to talk an hour on the subject. [Laughter.]

But still its iniquities have been discussed. The questions propounded by the gentleman from Illinois have never been answered. There has never been an attempt to answer them. You gentlemen on the other side could not answer the cold analysis of that bill made by the gentleman from Illinois.

The speech of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] has never been answered. But the bill will be read by the American people. They will call you people to account. They will notice the indecent haste you have exhibited here and the lack of consideration of the bill, even in the Committee of the Whole under the five-minute rule, let alone some of the parliamentary law that has been administered by the gentleman who now sits in that chair, the parallel of which was never, never brought out in any legislative assembly—I came pretty near saying has never disgraced any legislative assembly before in this country or in any other. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

Now, you gentlemen sit back there and say to yourselves, "We are running the steam roller." [Laughter on the Democratic side and cries of "Louder!"] And there is one gentleman over there, and I see him now, and perhaps he and others have followed like sheep after the bellwether between the tellers in voting on this bill without consideration—a gentleman who criticizes me because I am speaking too loudly. Well, I notice the gentlemen of the committee are giving me their attention, notwithstanding the disorder we have had in this House to-day and in this Committee of the Whole. There are men on that side of the House—not one, but scores—that would like to get away from the caucus agreement that was made without the consideration of this bill.

Whether the caucus agreement has followed out and controlled the decisions of points of order here to-day or not, I do not know; it has been hinted to me by some gentlemen on that side that it did, and they did not like to be bound by it. Whether or not it covered all the iniquities of this bill is not for me to say, but I notice that my friend from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] announced rather triumphantly that they were going to pass this bill without the crossing of a "t" or the dotting of an "i."

Under such circumstances what becomes of the American Congress? Is it bound up in the caucus of the majority—a secret caucus? Why you do not dare to let the light of publicity come in! You do not dare to let the newspapers come in! You seem to be hidden in a corner. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Oh, gentlemen, you will hear from it from one end of this country to the other. [Prolonged applause and demonstrations on the Democratic side.] This bill will be analyzed in the light of truth. The light of truth will be shed upon it. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And your hopes, your political hopes, will vanish when the American people come to find out what you are actually doing. And they will put in your places men who will study the questions that will come before them. [Prolonged applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KOPP. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. MANN. A parliamentary inquiry. What became of the amendment that I offered, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 3, line 14, by inserting after the word "fencing" the words "and paving."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. KOPP. Mr. Chairman, I sent an amendment to the Clerk's desk some time ago. Where is it? [Laughter on the Republican side and cries of "Lost!" "Lost!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin. The Chair desires to say that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KOPP] was recognized to offer an amendment, and the Chair thought it was his amendment that was being considered. The Clerk will now report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, strike out all of line 16 after the word "dressed," and all of lines 17 and 18.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KOPP].

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 3, line 14, by inserting after the word "laths" the words "pickets, palings, and staves of wood of all kinds."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky offers an amendment which the clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 18, after the words "cabinet woods," add the following: "Provided, Each and all of the articles specified in this section and produced in the United States shall be admitted free of duty into all countries, dependency, or dependencies which import any of said article or articles into this country."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that amendment is not germane.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer a further amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 8, line 14, by inserting after the word "wharves" the word "clapboards."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois.

The question being taken, the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. MANN. I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 80, noes 139.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer a further amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers another amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 3, by adding after the word "woods," in line 18, the following:

"Provided, however, That the articles named in this paragraph shall not be admitted free of duty from any country, dependency, Province, or other subdivision of government which forbids or restricts in any way the exportation of (whether by law, order, regulation, contractual relation, or otherwise, directly or indirectly) or imposes any export duty, export license fee, or other export charge of any kind whatsoever, either directly or indirectly (whether in the form of additional charge or license fee, or otherwise), upon any of the articles mentioned in this paragraph, or upon printing paper, wood pulp, or wood for use in the manufacture of wood pulp."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I make the point of order against the amendment.

Mr. MANN. I should like to be heard briefly on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, this is identically the provision in the existing law in reference to the admission of pulp wood and print paper into the United States.

Here is a proposition to admit lumber from Canada free of duty, although the Canadian Provinces put a restriction on the exportation of lumber, of logs, and of pulp wood cut on the Crown lands of those Provinces. The proposition which I now present is that lumber shall not be admitted free from Canada unless the Canadian Provinces remove their restrictions on the exportation of lumber and on the exportation of pulp wood.

It would seem that if we have the authority, as we have, to provide that lumber shall be admitted free of duty, we have in that connection the parliamentary power to provide that it shall only be admitted free when coming from a country which does not place an export tax upon lumber, or which does not forbid the exportation of logs which may be cut into lumber.

Under the proposition in the bill all of the lumber industry connected with the Canadian forests can and will be transferred to the Canadian side of the border, because the Canadian Provinces can restrict the exportation of rough lumber or undressed lumber, as they now restrict the exportation of logs. They can move the manufacture of print paper onto the other side of the line, because they will still be able to restrict the exportation of pulp wood having free access to the American markets. Under this bill at this time an opportunity is given to us to provide that lumber shall not come in free from Canada unless the Canadian Provinces permit the exportation of logs, and also permit the exportation of pulp wood, which is now forbidden by the Canadian Province regulations.

I had hoped that the gentlemen on the other side of the aisle, notwithstanding their caucus action, would be willing to make some effort to preserve to the newspapers of the country cheaper print paper. Without an amendment like this, the print-paper industry will unquestionably in the future be moved to Canada, and when that comes, the Canadian Provinces can make their regulations forbidding the exportation of pulp wood, or putting an export tax on paper, so that every user of paper in the United States will pay tribute to Canada as we now on coffee pay tribute to Brazil.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 3, after line 18, by inserting as a new paragraph the following:

"The provisions of the last preceding paragraph shall not apply to articles imported from any country, dependency, province, or colony, or other subdivision of government which imposes any tax or duty or restrictive regulation upon the importation into such country from the United States of any meats of any kind whatever, either fresh or preserved in any form, or of flour, live cattle, or cottonseed oil, or which prohibits or restricts in any way the exportation of news-print paper, wood pulp, or pulp wood."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that it is not germane.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 3, after line 18, by inserting as a new paragraph the following:

"House furniture, wholly or in chief value of wood, wholly or partly finished."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that it is not germane.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 3, after line 18, by inserting as a new paragraph the following:

"Briar root or briar wood, ivy or laurel root, and similar wood unmanufactured, or not further advanced than cut into blocks suitable for the articles into which they are intended to be converted."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that it is not germane.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. LANGLEY] to strike out the paragraph.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as folows:

Sewing machines and all parts thereof.

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 3, line 19, by striking out the words "sewing machines and all parts thereof."

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Chairman, it is so very evident that it is useless to discuss any amendment to this bill that I simply submit it to the vote of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. FULLER) there were—ayes 62, noes 132.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 3, after line 21, by inserting as a new paragraph the following:

"Needles for knitting or sewing machines, latch needles, crochet needles and tape needles, knitting and all other needles not specially provided for by law; but no articles other than the needles which are specifically named in this section shall be dutiable as needles unless having an eye and fitted and used for carrying a thread."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that it is not germane.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 3, by inserting after line 19, as a new paragraph, the following:

"Needles for sewing machines."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that this is not germane.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard for a moment on the point of order.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I will withdraw the point of order and ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the amendment is germane, and is in order. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Salt, whether in bulk or in bags, sacks, barrels, or other packages.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 3, by inserting after line 19, as a new paragraph, the following:

"Wearing apparel, articles of personal adornment, toilet articles, and similar personal effects of persons arriving in the United States; but this exemption shall only include such articles as actually accompany and are in the use of and as are necessary and appropriate for the wear and use of such persons, for the immediate purposes of the journey and present comfort and convenience, and shall not be held to apply to merchandise or articles intended for other persons or for sale: Provided, That in case of residents of the United States returning from abroad all wearing apparel and other personal effects taken by them out of the United States to foreign countries shall be admitted free of duty, without regard to their value, upon their identity being established, under appropriate rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury; and articles to the value of $100, without regard to the character, purchased abroad by such residents of the United States shall be admitted free of duty upon their return."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer another amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 3, after line 21, by inserting as a new paragraph the following:

"SEC. 2. The goods, wares, articles, and merchandise in this act named which are the growth, production, or manufacture of any foreign country not contiguous to the United States, shall be admitted free only when imported in vessels of the United States or in such foreign vessels as truly and wholly belong to the citizens or subjects of that country of which such goods, wares, articles, and merchandise are the growth, production, or manufacture, or from which such goods, wares, articles, or merchandise can only be or most usually are first shipped for transportation."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard on the point of order. The amendment is clearly in order on any conception of parliamentary law. The bill proposes to admit certain articles into the United States free of duty. The amendment is that as to articles coming from countries not contiguous to the United States the bill shall only apply when the goods are brought to the United States in American bottoms or in vessels belonging to citizens of the country from which they are exported. Now that sort of a provision has always been held in order upon tariff legislation. There is no distinction between this bill and any other bill as to that. In the last tariff bill we carried a provision in reference to vessels coming into our ports. Nearly every tariff bill ever passed has had some provision of the kind. This provision is simply to provide that articles shall be admitted free only when brought in certain vessels. It has usually been the case to provide that articles shall receive the usual tariff rates only when they are brought in certain vessels or shall pay 10 per cent more than the tariff rate if not brought in vessels belonging to American citizens or not protected by treaties. I do not hesitate to say that, in my opinion, without question, if the Chair will examine the amendment he will see, and ought to see, that the amendment is a mere limitation on the general scope of the bill, and is clearly in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House without amendment with the recommendation that the bill do pass. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama moves that the committee do now rise and report the bill, H. R. 4413, back to the House without amendment with the recommendation that it do pass.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. ALEXANDER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 4413, and had directed him to report the same back to the House without amendment with the recommendation that the bill do pass.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill to its final passage.

The question was taken, and the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed; and being engrossed, was read a third time.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following motion to recommit with instructions.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois offers a motion to recommit, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert as section 2 of the bill the following:

"SEC. 2. The provisions of this act shall apply only to goods, wares, articles, and merchandise when imported from a country, dependency, province, or colony, being the product thereof, which does not impose any tax or duty upon, or by way of regulation or otherwise practically prohibit, the importation into such country, dependency, province, or colony from the United States of flour or cottonseed oil or of live cattle and fresh, refrigerated, dried, smoked, salted, canned, or otherwise prepared or preserved meats, which are accompanied by a certificate of inspection by the proper officials of the United States, and which country, dependency, province, or colony does not prohibit or restrict in any manner or form the exportation of any of the articles named in this act, or of wood used in the manufacture of wood pulp or paper."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that this motion to recommit, if offered as an amendment, would not have been germane to the bill or the paragraphs of it, and therefore is not in order as a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] desire to be heard?

Mr. MANN. I desire to be heard on the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized.

Mr. MANN. I will be frank to say that I think if I had offered this proposition in Committee of the Whole it would have been ruled out of order by the then Chairman of the committee. But I prefer to have a ruling by the Speaker, who has greater responsibility in making rulings than any Chairman of the Committee of the Whole can have.

The bill proposes to place certain articles on the free list imported into the United States. The bill proposes to place upon the free list certain articles which are named in the bill, wherever they may come from. The proposition which I have offered in the way of amendment or instruction is to limit these articles which may be brought into the United States to those articles which come from certain countries which do not discriminate against American flour, American cottonseed oil, or American meats, and which do not discriminate against the American products of the character named in the bill when exported from the United States to foreign countries, and which do not discriminate against America by prohibiting the exportation of pulp wood.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if we have the power, as we have, of saying that we will admit all articles free of duty, we have the power by bill, as we propose in this case, to say that we admit certain articles free of duty. This bill might have said all articles of any character imported into the United States from foreign countries should be admitted free of duty. But it chose to say that certain articles named should be admitted free of duty. My amendment simply limits those articles a little further by providing that certain countries, if they do not grant reciprocal rights to American citizens, shall not have their goods brought in here free of duty. The bill as it has been presented and reported by the committee will not add a dollar to any American citizen's wealth, will not add a dollar to the commerce of the United States, will not add a dollar to the value of American agricultural products or American manufactured products. It proposes to give away the markets of the United States without any exchange whatever. I was raised in that school that believes in making trades at times and not giving away all that you have in the expectation that other people would deal so gently and generously by you that you would reach affluence through their generosity.

We have the right, in making this agreement, to make the trade. We have the right to say to the foreign country, "You can bring in your goods to our country free of duty if you will permit our goods in exchange to go into your country free of duty." To hold that we can not do that as an amendment upon this tariff bill is to hold that you can make no amendment to the bill whatever.

I do not think the Speaker now in the chair would be willing to hold, as the Chairman did, that you can not add anything to the bill now on the dutiable list and you can not add any duty to the free list now in the bill. There is no chance for amendment of any kind, practically, under that ruling.

I insist, Mr. Speaker, that it is in order to offer an amendment limiting the countries from which these goods can come, whether we limit them by name or limit them by description, requiring that no country shall have the right of free entry here unless it grants the right of admission of our meats and cottonseed oil and flour into that country.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to address the Chair on the question. I think the decisions are very clear that the amendment is not in order.

The SPEAKER. There are two decisions precisely in point in this matter. I will have the Clerk read them in order to shorten up the proceedings.

The Clerk read as follows:

It is not in order to do indirectly by a motion to recommit with instructions what may not be done directly by way of amendment.

On May 6, 1897, the House was considering a resolution reported from the Committee on Rules providing that "from and after this day the House shall meet only on Monday and Thursday of each week until the further order of the House."

Mr. JOSEPH W. BAILEY, of Texas, moved to recommit the resolution, with instruction to report as a substitute a resolution providing a time for the consideration of the bankruptcy bill (S. 1035).

Mr. JOHN DALZELL, of Pennsylvania, made a point of order against this motion.

The Speaker ruled:

The point of order being raised, the Chair thinks the amendment not germane. * * * Here is a proposition that the House shall meet on Mondays and Thursdays. Here is an amendment requesting that a particular bill shall be considered under certain conditions and formalities. Now, if that is germane to the other, it would be difficult to limit the range of germaneness anywhere on earth, it seems to the Chair. It has been decided by one of the predecessors of the present Speaker that this motion was not in order at all; but the present Speaker has decided otherwise, and he believes, with the approval of the House, giving the House more complete control over such matters; but it has been decided by all predecessors that no proposition can be offered as an instruction to a committee that would have been admissible as an amendment if it had been offered at the present time. Now, will any gentleman of the House say that this would be a proper amendment to the original resolution? The Chair thinks that it could not be.

5835. On January 21, 1891, Mr. JOSEPH G. CANNON, of Illinois, from the Committee on Rules, reported a resolution providing for the immediate consideration of the District of Columbia appropriation bill.

Mr. Richard P. Bland, of Missouri, moved that the resolution be recommitted to the Committee on Rules, with instructions to report back a resolution providing for the consideration of the bill (S. 4675) to provide a unit of value and for the coinage of gold and silver, etc.

Mr. CANNON made the point of order that the proposed instructions, not being germane to the resolution, were not now in order.

The Speaker sustained the point of order, holding that the instructions were not germane to the subject matter of the resolution.

Mr. Bland appealed from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. CANNON moved to lay the appeal on the table; and the question being put, it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 146, nays 122.

The SPEAKER. It is not necessary for the Chair to pass any opinion on the wisdom or unwisdom of this new rule; it is his duty to decide according to the rules. It is clear that the amendment offered by way of matter contained in the motion to recommit under this rule would not have been in order if offered as an amendment; and on the high authority of Mr. Speaker Reed and Mr. Speaker CANNON, I sustain the point of order made by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. I respectfully appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I move to lay that appeal on the table.

Mr. MANN. On that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 209, nays 129, answered "present" 4, not voting 43, as follows:

Mr. LOBECK (in favor) with Mr. BINGHAM (against).
Mr. COX of Indiana (in favor) with Mr. NYE (against).

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I was paired, by a transferable pair, with the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS]. Had he been here, he would have voted "aye," and would vote for the bill. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. PUJO] was paired by a transferable pair with the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MCMORRAN], who, if he had been here, would have voted against the bill. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. PUJO] and I have mutually agreed to transfer our pairs, and both of us have voted, leaving the record undisturbed, as both the gentlemen who are absent [Mr. GLASS and Mr. MCMORRAN] are thereby left paired.

The SPEAKER. Did the gentleman from Connecticut vote?

Mr. HILL. I did.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I should like to inquire if my colleague [Mr. BURKE of South Dakota] is recorded as voting?

The SPEAKER. He is not recorded as voting, and he has been announced as paired.

Mr. LITTLETON. Mr. Speaker, I voted "aye" on this motion. I observe from the announcement of the pairs that I am paired with the gentleman from New York [Mr. DWIGHT]. For that reason I ask that my vote be withdrawn and that I be recorded as present.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The announcement of the result was received with applause on the Democratic side.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following motion to recommit with instructions, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Recommit the bill to the Committee on Ways and Means with instructions to report the bill back immediately amended by striking out of the bill the provisions pertaining to the admission of meats, flour, and all other food products, being lines 4 to 12, inclusive, on page 3, and by striking out, also, the words "not sweetened," in line 12, page 3.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the previous question on the motion to recommit.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Dakota demands the yeas and nays. Those favoring the ordering of the yeas and nays will rise and stand until counted. [After counting.] Eleven gentlemen, not a sufficient number, and the yeas and nays are refused. The question is on the motion to recommit.

The question was taken, and the motion to recommit was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 236, nays 109, answered "present" 4, not voting 37, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Coast Defenses be, and the same is hereby, authorized to employ a stenographer, to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate, at the rate of $1,200 per annum, said employment to continue during the Sixty-second Congress.

INDEPENDENT REPUBLICS OF THE WESTERN HEMISPHERE.

Mr. RAYNER. I ask that Senate resolution 35, offered yesterday by me, be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A resolution (S. Res. 35) making a declaration of principles to govern the United States in its relations with the independent Republics of the Western Hemisphere.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the resolution will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. The Chair hears no objection, and the resolution is so referred.

REVISION OF THE LAWS—THE JUDICIARY.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask that the speech of Hon. REUBEN O. MOON, of Pennsylvania, chairman of the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, made in the House of Representatives Wednesday, December 7, 1910, on the bill to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary, be printed as a Senate document. (S. Doc. No. 23.)

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 4413. An act to place on the free list agricultural implements, cotton bagging, cotton ties, leather, boots and shoes, fence wire, meats, cereals, flour, bread, timber, lumber, sewing machines, salt, and other articles was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Finance.

NATIONAL HOME FOR DISABLED VOLUNTEER SOLDIERS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed, and the calendar is in order under Rule VIII.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 14) for the appointment of a member of the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers was announced as first in order on the calendar.

Mr. BROWN. I ask that the joint resolution may go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will go over.

AMENDMENT OF CERTAIN APPROPRIATION ACTS.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 1) to correct errors in the enrollment of certain appropriation acts approved March 4, 1911, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was read as follows:

Whereas certain errors were made in the enrollment of certain appropriation acts approved March 4, 1911, as is evidenced by the conference report submitted to and adopted by the Senate and House of Representatives at the last session of the Sixty-first Congress:

Resolved, etc., That the sundry civil appropriation act approved March 4, 1911, is amended as follows:

So much of said act as appropriates $30,000 for an electric-lighting plant, including the enlargement of the power house and one new boiler at the Battle Mountain Sanitarium, Hot Springs, S. Dak., is repealed.

The appropriation made in said act for analyzing and testing of the coals, lignites, ores, and other mineral fuel substances belonging to or for the use of the United States is reduced from $135,000 to $100,000.

The appropriation made in said act for protection and improvement of Mount Rainier National Park, Wash., is reduced from $5,400 to $5,000.

So much of the general deficiency appropriation act approved March 4, 1911, as appropriates the sum of $500 to reimburse the State board of regents of the University of Idaho for the premium paid on an indemnity bond is repealed.

The Post Office appropriation act approved March 4, 1911, is amended as follows:

So much of said act as appropriates the sum of $50,000 for expenses of or authorizes the appointment of a commission to inquire and report touching the cost to the Government of the transportaion of all classes of second-class mail matter is repealed.

The appropriation made in said act for travel allowance to railway postal clerks is reduced from $1,000,750 to $769,000.

So much of said act as authorizes the Postmaster General to allow railway postal clerks and the employees of the mail-lock and mail-bag repair shops an annual vacation of 30 days with pay is repealed.

The naval appropriation act approved March 4, 1911, is amended as follows:

So much of the paragraph appropriating for "Contingent Navy," in said act as reads as follows:

"And provided further, That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he hereby is, authorized, in his discretion, to make partial payments from time to time during the progress of the work under existing contracts and all contracts hereafter made under the Navy Department for public purposes, but not in excess of 90 per cent of the value of work already done; and the contracts hereafter made shall provide for such insurance as the Secretary of the Navy may deem sufficient, and for a lien in favor of the Government, which lien is hereby made paramount to all other liens, upon the articles or thing contracted for on account of all payments so made, provided that partial payments shall not be made under such contracts except where stipulated for, and then only in accordance with contract provisions," is repealed.

Mr. WARREN. I should like to have the report read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read the report.

The Secretary read the report submitted by Mr. WARREN on the 4th instant, as follows:

The Committee on Appropriations, which has had under consideration the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 1) to correct errors in the enrollment of certain appropriation acts approved March 4, 1911, reports the same to the Senate favorably and with certain amendments, and recommends that as amended the joint resolution be passed.

Strike out the preamble.

Amend the title by omitting the words "correct errors in the enrollment of," and inserting in lieu the word "amend," so that the title will read as follows: "Joint resolution to amend certain appropriation acts approved March 4, 1911."

The purposes of the joint resolution are manifestly to carry out the intent of Congress in enacting the various appropriation bills proposed to be amended. An examination of the printed bills, with Senate amendments numbered, which were before the conferees, together with the conference reports thereon and the accompanying written statements, or oral statements made in debate in the Senate or House of Representatives and printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, shows conclusively that the conferees were in perfect accord and that their reports to the Senate and House were identical and that it was not the intention of Congress that any one of the provisions now sought to be repealed should have been enacted as a part of the respective appropriation acts mentioned.

It will be remembered that the final passage of the sundry civil and deficiency appropriation bills, as well as the Post Office and naval appropriation bills, occurred during the last hours of the Sixty-first Congress, when the business of the Senate was congested; and consequently the work of enrollment of these large bills was almost beyond human power within the time which elapsed between the final passage of the bills and the hour of adjournment.

The first item which the joint resolution proposes to repeal is an appropriation of $30,000 for an electric-lighting plant, including enlargement of power house and one new boiler, at Battle Mountain Sanitarium, S. Dak. This item was covered by Senate amendment No. 57, page 138, sundry civil appropriation bill, from which amendment the Senate receded. (See conference report, H. Rept. 2301, 61st Cong.)

The second item, which the joint resolution proposes to reduce by $35,000, is an appropriation of $135,000 for analyzing and testing coals, lignites, ores, and other mineral fuel substances belonging to or for the use of the United States. This item was covered by Senate amendment No. 64, page 156, sundry civil appropriation bill, which amendment increased the amount as passed by the House of Representatives from $100,000 to $135,000, and from which amendment the Senate receded, thereby leaving the amount $100,000. (See conference report, H. Rept. 2301, 61st Cong.)

The third item, which the joint resolution proposes to reduce by $400, is an appropriation of $5,400 for protection and improvement of Mount Rainier National Park, Wash. This item was covered by Senate amendment No. 70, page 162, sundry civil appropriation bill, which amendment increased the amount as passed by the House of Representatives from $3,000 to $8,400. The House receded from its disagreement to this amendment with an amendment reducing the amount from $8,400 to $5,000, to which the Senate agreed. (See conference report, H. Rept. 2301, 61st Cong.)

The fourth item, which the joint resolution proposes to repeal, is an appropriation of $500 to reimburse the State board of regents of the University of Idaho for premium paid on an indemnity bond. This item was covered by Senate amendment No. 9, page 17, general deficiency appropriation bill, from which amendment the Senate receded. (See conference report, H. Rept. 2302, 61st Cong.)

The fifth item, which the joint resolution proposes to repeal, is an authorization for the appointment of a postal commission and an appropriation of $50,000 for the expenses of the same. This item was covered by Senate amendment No. 23, pages 20 to 21, Post Office appropriation bill. The House receded from its disagreement to this amendment with an amendment omitting the authorization and appropriation referred to (which had been covered by another measure, Public Res. No. 66), but retaining the balance of the matter covered by amendment No. 23, to which the Senate agreed. (See conference report, H. Rept. 2305, 61st Cong.)

The sixth item, which the joint resolution proposes to reduce by $231,750, is an appropriation of $1,000,750 for travel allowance to railway postal clerks. This item was covered by Senate amendment No. 29, page 26, Post Office appropriation bill, which amendment increased the amount as passed by the House of Representatives from $769,000 to $1,000,750, and from which amendment the Senate receded, thereby leaving the amount $769,000. (See conference report, H. Rept. 2305, 61st Cong.)

The seventh item, which the joint resolution proposes to repeal, authorizes the Postmaster General to allow railway postal clerks and the employees of the mail-lock and mail-bag repair shops an annual vacation of 30 days with pay. This item was covered by Senate amendment No. 30, page 26, Post Office appropriation bill, from which amendment the Senate receded. (See conference report, H. Rept. 2305, 61st Cong.)

The eighth item, which the joint resolution proposes to repeal, relates to partial payments on contracts made by the Navy Department. This item was covered by Senate amendment No. 4, pages 5 to 6, naval appropriation bill. The House receded from its disagreement to this amendment with an amendment omitting the matter relating to partial payments on contracts made by the Navy Department, but retaining the balance of the matter covered by amendment No. 4, to which the Senate agreed. (See conference report, H. Rept. 2306, 61st Cong.)

A condensed statement of the appropriations proposed to be repealed and reduced by the joint resolution is given, as follows:

Electric-lighting plant, Battle Mountain Sanitarium, S. Dak., repealed	$30,000
Analyzing and testing coals, lignites, ores, etc., reduced from $135,000 to $100,000	35,000
Protection and improvement of Mount Rainier National Park, Wash., reduced from $5,400 to $5,000	400
Reimbursement of board of regents, University of Idaho, for premium paid on indemnity bond, repealed	500
Provision for and expenses of a postal commission, repealed	50,000
Travel allowance to railway postal clerks, reduced from $1,000,750 to $769,000	231,750
Total reduction	347,650

In addition to the sums of money above itemized the following provisions of law are also repealed:

In the Post Office appropriation act:

"That the Postmaster General may allow railway postal clerks whose duties require them to work six days or more a week throughout the year and the employees of the mail-lock and mail-bag repair shops an annual vacation of 30 days with pay."

In the naval appropriation act:

"And provided further, That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he hereby is, authorized, in his discretion, to make partial payments from time to time during the progress of the work under existing contracts and all contracts hereafter made under the Navy Department for public purposes, but not in excess of 90 per cent of the value of work already done; and the contracts hereafter made shall provide for such insurance as the Secretary of the Navy may deem sufficient, and for a lien in favor of the Government, which lien is hereby made paramount to all other liens, upon the articles or thing contracted for on account of all payments so made, provided that partial payments shall not be made under such contracts except where stipulated for and then only in accordance with contract provisions."

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I do not think that this joint resolution comes out of the committee in the manner provided by the rules of this body. Rule XXIII deals with preambles. An examination of the joint resolution will disclose the fact that the committee has struck out the preamble in the joint resolution as it came from the other House. Rule XXIII provides:

When a bill or resolution is accompanied by a preamble, the question shall first be put on the bill or resolution and then on the preamble, which may be withdrawn by a mover before an amendment of the same, or ordering of the yeas and nays; or it may be laid on the table without prejudice to the bill or resolution, and shall be a final disposition of such preamble.

I think that the record of the joint resolution as it comes from the committee is in violation of that rule.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, in what way?

Mr. HEYBURN. In the first place, when that joint resolution came from the other House with the preamble on it, the preamble should have remained upon it until the joint resolution came into the Senate.

Mr. WARREN. And it does so remain now.

Mr. HEYBURN. No; it is stricken out on the face of the joint resolution.

Mr. WARREN. It is recommended to be stricken out.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate has not stricken the preamble out. The committee has recommended striking it out, but the Senate has taken no action thereon.

Mr. WARREN. The committee's recommendation is entirely within the rule, Mr. President.

Mr. HEYBURN. That we are entirely within the rule is a very convincing statement; but of course the Senate is already advised that objection will be urged against the joint resolution on account of the statements contained in the preamble, and that because of those statements it is not within the power of this Congress to do what is proposed to be done by the joint resolution, so that the committee, in order to disembarrass itself, has stricken out the preamble.

Mr. President, I am very conscious of the fact, and I do not say it in any sense as intended to criticize the committee, but I am talking now about the status of the joint resolution—that the purpose of the committee in reporting the joint resolution without the preamble is that the joint resolution may appear upon its face to be a legitimate subject of legislation and within the power of the Senate.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. WARREN. Of course the committee can not, as the Senator knows, strike out the preamble, but it is the duty of a committee in considering a subject to make recommendations. The committee has recommended that before the joint resolution leaves the Senate the preamble shall be stricken out, and that is a matter for the Senate to determine. The committee believes, and I now believe, that it acted entirely within the rule; in fact, I do not quite see how the committee in considering the joint resolution could do otherwise, if it felt that the preamble should be stricken out, than to so recommend to the Senate, and it is for the Senate to take such action upon the preamble as it may see fit.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, Rule XXIII provides how a preamble shall be disposed of, and among those provisions I find none authorizing it to be stricken out by a committee.

Mr. WARREN. Well, Mr. President, I wish to say once more—the Senator knows it as well as I do—that the committee has not stricken the preamble out and has not the power to strike it out.

Mr. HEYBURN. They have not the power to act upon the question of striking it out; and yet they have undertaken to do so, for the joint resolution comes to us with the report of the committee with the preamble stricken out. We use the term "stricken out" when lines are drawn through any portion of a proposed measure. It is not within the province of the committee to deal with that preamble, and the rule says so.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Does the Senator from Idaho think that he or I could not, if the committee had not reported as it has, move to strike the preamble out and ask a vote of the Senate upon that motion?

Mr. HEYBURN. But there is nobody proposing to do that; and if it could be done, we have not reached that stage. Action must be had upon the joint resolution by the Senate before any action can be had upon the preamble.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. But suppose the committee had reported the joint resolution as it passed the other House and recommended its adoption in that form, would it not have been proper for the Senator himself, under the rules of the Senate, to have moved to strike out the preamble and to ask for a vote of the Senate on that motion?

Mr. HEYBURN. I will call the attention of the Senator to what may be done:

When a bill or resolution is accompanied by a preamble, the question shall first be put on the bill or resolution and then on the preamble, which may be withdrawn by a mover before an amendment of the same, or ordering of the yeas and nays—

That is one thing which may be done—a motion may be made in the Senate to withdraw the preamble—or it may be laid on the table without prejudice to the bill or resolution, and shall be a final disposition of such preamble.

Now, I want to make it perfectly plain why I am raising this question.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If the Senator will permit me, does the Senator think that those methods of disposing of a preamble are the only methods which the Senate may adopt?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. And that it would be entirely improper to move to strike out the preamble of a bill or joint resolution in the Senate?

Mr. HEYBURN. The question is not to strike out; it is to withdraw it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. But the question I ask the Senator is whether or not he thinks under the rules of the Senate——

Mr. HEYBURN. This is a rule of the Senate.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That a Senator can not move to strike out the preamble of a bill or joint resolution?

Mr. HEYBURN. I think not, because the method for the disposition of that very question is provided by the standing rules of the Senate.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, let me remind the Senator that it has been the uniform practice of the Senate to do otherwise. Motions have been made repeatedly, even during my short time in the Senate, to do that very thing, and I never heard any question raised before that a Senator could not move to strike out a preamble.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is after the passage of the bill. The rule says that may be in order after action upon the bill, but not before.

Mr. President, my purpose in raising this question will be obvious. The preamble of the joint resolution will defeat it if it comes before the Senate. The preamble is a part of the joint resolution as sent here by the other House. The joint resolution comes to us with the preamble in it, as a part of it.

Mr. WARREN. And the joint resolution so stands before us now.

Mr. HEYBURN. I understand that construction of the language perfectly.

Mr. WARREN. Do I understand that the Senator has made a point of order?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Oh, no; the Senator has made no point of order.

Mr. HEYBURN. The joint resolution is before the Senate.

Mr. WARREN. Certainly; and I wish to know whether the Senator contends that it is not before the Senate in an orderly way?

Mr. HEYBURN. I am not discussing that subject, nor making any such contention, but the joint resolution, being before the Senate, is open to consideration both as to form and substance. So I say, Mr. President, that if any weight at all is to be given to the action of the committee, it will militate against the position that will be taken, I assume, by a majority of the Senate, that we can not amend the records of a previous Congress, because the preamble sets forth that that is the purpose of the joint resolution, to amend the records of a previous Congress.

This measure will not pass without very considerable and careful consideration. Aside from the amounts involved, it is about as far-reaching a measure of legislation as has been before this body at any time. It involves the question of the right of one Congress to amend the action of another Congress in the way of correcting alleged errors. A bill may be introduced to repeal legislation of the last Congress if there is nothing upon the face of the bill to show that it is not an ordinary act proposed for the purpose of repealing legislation which has become subject to such action; but in this case the preamble sets forth—and Senators may not have had their attention called to it—that—

Whereas certain errors were made in the enrollment of certain appropriation acts approved March 4, 1911, as is evidenced by the conference report submitted to and adopted by the Senate and House of Representatives at the last session of the Sixty-first Congress.

In my judgment, and, I think, in the judgment of any lawyer in the Senate, it is not possible for us to correct the report of a conference committee of the last Congress. That Congress is closed. We can repeal its enactments, but we can not correct its records. This joint resolution involves the consideration of the report of a conference committee which has received the approval of both Houses of Congress on a bill which has received the signature and approval of the President of the United States. We may have enacted unwise laws, and it may be wise to repeal them, but we can not repeal them by the process of correcting the report of a conference committee in a Congress that has expired. It was undoubtedly the purpose of the other House to enter into the correction of the records of the last Congress, for they say so.

The Senator from Wyoming, in charge of this measure, says that this is a joint resolution to repeal provisions of law enacted by the last Congress.

Mr. WARREN. On the contrary, this joint resolution does not seek to change the record except so far as the enrolling is concerned, because the conference reports all show—and they are quoted in language and by number, and the page numbers are also given in the report—that the legislation, as acted upon by the Senate and House, was exactly what it will be when this joint resolution shall have passed.

Mr. HEYBURN. Would the Senator contend that if an examination of the informal records of a conference committee disclosed the fact that a measure did not receive a majority vote, a subsequent Congress could go back and inquire into it? The Senator will not contend for any such principle as that.

Mr. WARREN. But no Congress closes the door against the next Congress repealing whatever it sees fit.

Mr. HEYBURN. No; I have conceded that from the beginning; but the Congress of the United States, the only branch that has undertaken to act on it, has not undertaken to repeal it. It has simply undertaken to correct the record of a previous Congress.

Now, the Senate committee having charge of this measure undertakes to transform its whole character and to come in here with a measure repealing in direct terms legislation which one branch of the Congress says was irregularly or erroneously enacted.

We can not pass upon the manner or the sufficiency of the act of a previous Congress. If the Senate, or any Member of the Senate, desires to introduce a bill here for the purpose of repealing those laws, I care not for what reason it is asked that they be repealed, that is a perfectly regular and legitimate proposition, but it is a high-handed proposition to undertake to do indirectly that which can not be done under the rules of the Senate or under the Constitution of the United States. For that reason I made the inquiry as to this preamble, because it is the preamble that is to determine the character of this legislation and consequently the power of Congress to enact it.

It will be confessed—I may anticipate as well as the Senator from Wyoming—that the part of the laws here sought to be repealed or changed by reason of alleged mistakes—and it is not material whether the allegation is good or bad—have been executed; that the executive branches of the Government have acted upon the legislation which is now sought to be nullified because it is alleged that some clerk misinterpreted some marks made upon some piece of paper in the informal consideration of the matter before a committee of conference.

That conference report was sent to both Houses of Congress. Each House has a Committee on Enrolled Bills, whose business it is to see to it that the bills, as enrolled, are as enacted, and the legislation passed the scrutiny of both Houses of Congress, of the Committee on Enrolled Bills of each House, and of the President of the United States.

Mr. WARREN. It did not pass the scrutiny of both Houses as enrolled. It passed the scrutiny of neither one in that form, because both Houses voted separately upon the conference reports, and the conference reports set out exactly what the law will be when this act shall have passed, if it passes.

Mr. HEYBURN. The conference report was made to both Houses of Congress. It is a responsible declaration of the conclusion of the conference committee representing each House, and when each House adopts a conference report the measure is then ready for the signature of the Presiding Officer of each House; and in this case this measure, or the several measures, received the signature of the Presiding Officer of each House, and they passed the scrutiny of the Committee on Enrolled Bills, and they passed the scrutiny of the President of the United States, who gave them his signature and approval. They are laws.

What has been the status of this legislation between the day on which the President approved it and this hour? Have they not been laws of the United States? Is there any defect in the manner of their enactment? I would like to have some Senator point out or designate the status of the laws as they now stand upon the statute books; and if any Senator can say that those laws are less effective, that they are less the laws of the land than any others admitted to be regular, I will then be ready to consider the question whether or not we can by a declaration of inaccuracy say—I am not so particular about Senators listening to my remarks, but I should like to hear them myself.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate will please be in order.

Mr. HEYBURN. This is not a question of minor importance. It involves not only this measure, but the question of the right of Congress to correct the records of the last Congress. That is the question involved. The preamble can not be acted on until the joint resolution has first been acted on, unless it is withdrawn in the manner prescribed by Rule XXIII. We frequently enact bills here carrying a preamble, and then, after the bill is passed, it is moved that the preamble be laid on the table—a proper motion. Now, if we are going to proceed in that way, let the report of the committee show that they have reported the joint resolution as it came from the House. It is not competent to amend it by striking out the preamble, because of Rule XXIII of this body. The joint resolution must stand here for consideration with the preamble a part of it until the measure is acted on, and if the joint resolution is favorably acted on, then a motion is in order to lay the preamble on the table. If we are going to have standing rules of this body, let us conform to them.

But, aside from the question of the rules, the morals of the proposition are bad. Just open the door once here to the correction of the action of the last Congress and consider what the condition would be if the political sentiment of the succeeding Congress was radically different from that of the preceding one and they should say, "There was something irregular in the proceedings before the committee of conference"—or at any other stage—"and for that reason we propose to correct the proceedings of the last Congress so as to affect the status of the law of the land."

This, a special session of Congress, is no place, nor does it afford the proper time or opportunity, to repeal or enter upon a consideration of the repeal of the statutes of the last Congress.

Some one has had a sore spot in his mind against the legislation of the last Congress, and it is proposed by correcting the records of that Congress to undo its action at this Congress. Now, for the purposes of argument I will concede that if it was in the same Congress that enacted the bill they might correct their records within the time prescribed and in the manner prescribed by the rules. A more dangerous precedent could not be established than that of correcting the record of the last Congress. Because some Member wants to do it or because a number of Members would like to do it, either because they did not approve of the legislation of the last Congress or because they wanted new legislation without enacting it, affords no excuse for the attempt. It attacks the integrity of the law and of the manner of making the laws. It is an attack upon the stability of law. How do we know that within the next few days somebody, in reading over the proceedings of the last Congress, may not discover some other legislation that is obnoxious to him and go back and, hunting up scraps of paper lying around the room in which the conference was held, find some real or imaginary memoranda that he thinks could be made the basis of discrediting the legislation of that Congress, and if one can attack on a minor question he can attack on questions of the gravest import.

In this case they undertake to strike out appropriations that were made after due deliberation. To be personal, which I dislike always, I asked the chairman of the committee when this conference report came in if they had kept in a certain provision with reference to an appropriation for the University of Idaho, and I was assured that it was kept in. Had it not been that I received that assurance, I would have tied up that conference report until we could exercise the privilege of reasoning with them further or sending it back for further conference. It was upon the assurance that the amendment which I had proposed to that bill, and which had passed—had been accepted by the Senate—had been kept in in conference that the conference report was permitted, so far as I was concerned, to be adopted by the Senate.

Now, they go back among the lead-pencil memoranda and fragments of a committee room and dig up something which bears or may bear—it is not before us—the semblance of a reason or excuse for changing the solemn law of the land. I have uttered this protest against it not so much because of the magnitude of the item, although it was an appropriation for the university of the State, but because it is entering upon a course of legislation that would destroy the principle of fixity and finality in the enactment of a law that had received the sanction and the signature of the presiding officers of Congress and of the President of the United States.

AFFAIRS IN MEXICO.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I do not rise to discuss the particular joint resolution before the Senate, but to take advantage of its pendency to make some brief observations on a subject that lies near to my heart.

It is with sincere regret I read in this morning's papers accounts of the battle fought at Juarez, Mexico, on yesterday, between the federal forces occupying that city and a force of revolutionists attacking it. As a result of that conflict it is reported that five or six persons were slain and two or three times that number more or less seriously wounded in the city of El Paso, Tex. Those killed or injured on the American side included both men and women. I quote the following from the Associated Press dispatches:

One woman, sitting on her porch several blocks within the city, was hit in the wrist and the abdomen by two bullets.

Mrs. Joe Morehead, living at 610 West San Antonio Street, while out in her yard this afternoon, was shot. She is seriously wounded.

A bullet whistled close to some women, who were passing, and went into the side of the window of the Vermajillo Coal Co.'s office.

Five people on the American side of the line were killed and at least 12 wounded.

In addition to the actual injury done to persons on the American side of the river, bullets were showered on El Paso, and the lives of people generally were endangered. I quote further from the Associated Press:

About 3 o'clock bullets struck W. E. Sharp's house and also hit the sidewalk in front of J. C. Wilmarth's house.

Bullets struck residences at least 2 miles from where the firing was in progress.

One bullet went through two signboards near the United States immigration station, whistled over the heads of Lieut. Turney, W. F. Griffiths, of the Immigration Service, and others, and imbedded itself in another signboard.

Several bullets hit the immigration station. These came from the insurrectionary rifles, evidently.

Just before noon a Mauser bullet of steel fell in front of Phillip Bohn's store at 400 South El Paso Street.

A bullet struck the residence of Mrs. M. Grandmougen, at 511 Myrtle Avenue, and narrowly missed Mrs. F. P. Blair, who was sitting on the porch.

Mauser bullets fell in a yard in Missouri Street. The bullets are steel clad, and evidently from a federal rifle.

The Vilas public school was dismissed at 11 o'clock because Superintendent Crozier feared for the safety of the children.

There is more of like kind, but what I have read sufficiently indicates the extent and character of the terrible tragedy enacted in this American city on yesterday. The news reports are to the effect that the fighting will be renewed to-day. If it is renewed, all we can do is to wait with bated breath and dread apprehension to hear how many American men, women, and children are made the bloody victims of the onslaught. I say all we can do is to wait for news, for, judging to-day by yesterday and the future by the past, our Government does not intend to lift a hand for the protection of its own people in their own homes. It is the misfortune of these good people that they live in Texas on the American shore of the Rio Grande. It may be that, in addition to Mauser bullets, this fair city of the Lone Star State may be swept by shrapnel and cannister, by Gatling guns, and cannon balls. For mercy's sake, I hope not, but as our Government does not intend to lift a hand for the protection of our people, the Mexican soldiery can work their bloody havoc apparently without fear of responsibility to us.

Mr. President, this is a repetition of the frightful tragedy enacted at Douglas, Ariz., a few weeks ago. At that time I raised my voice in denunciation of that crime and in vehement protest against permitting its repetition. I was surprised and mortified that in that denunciation and protest I not only stood alone, but I brought down upon my head a shower of criticism and reproach from distinguished Senators on this floor. I proposed a resolution at that time authorizing the President to use force, if necessary, to prevent injury to our people as the result of battles on the border. My proposition was that the President should notify the responsible authorities of both the federal and insurrectionary forces that outrages like that at Douglas would not be permitted, and that if the same thing should be again attempted and persisted in, the President should instantly employ such military force as might be necessary to stop it. I did not propose to invade Mexico with the object of remaining and occupying the territory of that country, but to carry across the line only so much of our Army as might be required to accomplish the immediate end in view, and after it had been accomplished to withdraw our forces from the Mexican side. I insisted then, as I insist now, that we have the right to do that much in the interest of humanity, for our own protection and for the preservation of public order on the border line, where disorder concerns the lives and property of our people, as well as the lives and property of Mexicans.

We were told that to send a military force across the border for any purpose or on any provocation is war, and that a step of that kind would precipitate a conflict between the two countries. I was called to sharp account for what I said and for the resolution I offered, and I was gravely advised by the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] that any such act on our part as that I suggested would be a step backward in the march of civilization. Other Senators indulged in observations of the same general nature. I asked what should be done and what we could do for the safety of our own people, and was told there was nothing we could do. In other words, it seemed that these distinguished Senators looked upon the United States as helpless, bound hand and foot by some refined and altruistic considerations that are beyond the comprehension of ordinary men.

My speech of protest and appeal is buried in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and my resolution (S. Res. 19) directing the Committee on Foreign Relations to investigate the facts and report what action should be taken by Congress is buried in the archives of the committee room. The newspapers report the President as saying that he will take no affirmative action until he is authorized to do so by the Congress, and Senators say that Congress can not, without violating some red-tape precedent, take any action until the President first calls upon the Congress for its advice and direction. And so, between the upper and nether millstones of this disgraceful governmental inaction, peaceable American citizens residing on the border are being ground to ashes.

Mr. President, in the address I made to the Senate some weeks ago I took occasion most heartily to approve the action of the President in mobilizing a military force along the Mexican border. I then gave what I considered, and still consider, ample and sufficient reasons to justify what the President did. But I supposed, when the President went to the trouble and expense of calling these troops from their barracks throughout the country and hurriedly transported them to the border, that he meant to make that force effective for the protection of American citizens, if unhappily an occasion arose for using them in that behalf. I did not dream that the Government of the United States was merely engaged upon a game of bluff. I did not for a moment suspect that there was any of the blood and temper of Bob Acres or Sir John Falstaff in the War Department. I deemed this a matter too serious to be dealt with by fuming and blustering. I am curious to know what the President and the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy had in mind when marines were loaded aboard our battleships and this flying column of 20,000 men was hurried with the utmost dispatch to the Mexican border. Was all this hasty preparation—this beating of drums and blowing of bugles, and all this martial circumstance and pomp of war merely and wholly for peaceful parade and sham-battle maneuvering for military training? That can not be. The President must have had a more serious purpose in mind at the start, but manifestly a change has come over the spirit of his dream. What potent and mighty influences have operated to produce that change, I do not know and can not tell. Since this army was assembled on the Rio Grande we have heard more than the usual quantum of talk about world peace and disarmament. That precious old doctrine about beating swords into plowshares and spears into pruning hooks has been suddenly revived with unwonted energy, and the Commander in Chief of our Army and Navy has become one of its chief apostles. Undoubtedly the doctrine is a good one for it is founded on the Good Book.

I am for peace not war, as much so as any man. I would love to see the great armaments now maintained by nations on land and sea in large measure disappear, and thus relieve the industrial toilers of the world of grievous burdens. I would love to see all the people of the earth dwell together in peace and amity, and settle all their international controversies by arbitration or other peaceful methods. I heartily approve of every sensible and practical step taken by any man or Government in that direction. But the millenium has not yet dawned upon the world, and men are little nearer the angelic state than they were a century or two ago. Nations are still armed and warlike, and in some countries the brute instinct and passion of men are uppermost. We have not yet reached that period of progress when we can palsy the hand that holds the sword by merely waving the white flower of peace. We have not and we can not stop the murder of our women and children in Texas and Arizona by standing aloof under a white flag and giving notice to the world that we will not, under any circumstances, strike a blow in resistance or for self-protection.

Why, Mr. President, only the other day the newspapers printed an order issued from the War Department directing the commanding officer at El Paso not only to keep his troops securely on this side the line, but also to use them to whatever extent might be necessary to prevent the men of Texas themselves from crossing over to defend their wives, children, and homes. Surely that was not the original purpose the President and his Secretary of War had in mind when they summoned these troops from every quarter of the land and sent them scurrying to Texas. The Government seems to have come to this point: That it will not only not protect the people itself, but that it will not permit the people to protect themselves. Here we confront a situation where a motley band of insurrectionists, throwing off the authority of their leader and in open disobedience of his orders, attack the federal force at Juarez. In that battle both sides fired into El Paso with equally fatal results. Madero is not able to control his army, and the Government of Mexico appears to be both imbecile and powerless.

In the face of all this the President and the Congress stand with bowed heads and folded hands, seemingly unwilling to stop, or hopelessly incapable of stopping, this sanguinary disorder on the border line, although resulting in such serious consequences to our own people.

I wish again, although I may still stand alone, to record my earnest and solemn protest against this inaction of our Government—a degree of inaction so pronounced that it smacks too much of something I do not like to name. Speaking for myself, I am more sensitive about the lives of American men, women, and children, peaceably pursuing the even tenor of their way on their own soil and about their own homes, than I am about the pride and sensibilities of other men who have on their hands the innocent blood of our people. I am more concerned about the American flag being in fact an emblem of protection to American citizens than I am about offending those who themselves display but little respect for our rights and our sovereignty. I would at all hazards defend and protect our people against such monstrous outrages as those at Douglas and El Paso, let the consequences be what they might, and hence I appeal to the Committee on Foreign Relations to at once consider the resolution I offered and make some recommendation as to the duty of this Government.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I think there can be very little question about the fact that if the course were pursued which is recommended by the Senator from Missouri this country would certainly be plunged into war.

Of course no one can view with indifference or without very strong emotion the fact of the killing of innocent people on American soil as a consequence of a struggle progressing beyond our borders, and the emotion of the Senator from Missouri does honor to his heart, whatever we may think of the correctness of his judgment.

I presume that there have been similar conditions in the past, but I have not had the opportunity to look them up. However, it is an anomalous condition, where in a struggle between hostile forces on the other side of our border the lives of our own citizens are not only endangered but are absolutely sacrificed. It is an extremely grave situation and one in dealing with which we must not be limited in our vision to that which is nearest to us, to that which may be more direct and exciting in its presentation, but we must look over the whole field and see where certain steps, if taken, must necessarily lead.

There are some things in life, Mr. President, that are without full remedy, some situations which can not be dealt with in a way to correct every evil or to guard against every danger, and the best that we can do is to act in such a way as to guard against the greatest evil and avoid the greatest danger.

Now, Mr. President, what is the situation? The Government of Mexico is a recognized Government by the nations of the earth, entitled by every law known to man to reassert its authority, if it has the power to do so, when that authority is threatened or in any manner impaired. That is one side of the situation. The other side is equally definite and marked. A revolution is not a legal right, but it is a human right, one which has existed not only in times of barbarism and of savagery but among all peoples in the times of the greatest enlightenment and of the highest civilization. Therefore we are confronted now with a contest in a neighboring territory between the recognized constituted authority on the one hand and a revolutionary effort upon the other, each having its rights recognized by law and by human experience.

Recognizing that, Mr. President, what is the right of the Mexican Government under present conditions? If a revolution, or a rebellion, if you please, is in progress which threatens and denies the authority of the Mexican Government, and if the parties who are opposed are upon our border, and the Mexican Government can not by force reassert its authority without danger to persons upon this side of the line, can it be said that the right of the Mexican Government to reassert its authority must be abandoned; that it could not at any time, either in the present or the future, attempt to reassert its authority because in so doing it may endanger lives on the other side of the line?

Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri, I think, dealt somewhat extravagantly, or rather in too great a degree—I will use the softened expression—in his estimate of the replies which had been made to him upon a former occasion by Senators when similar suggestions had been made by him and when he offered the resolution to which he has adverted to-day. I do not think that there was any denunciation of the Senator. Nobody doubted the patriotism of the Senator; nobody questioned for a moment but that the impulses which moved him were those which did honor, I again say, to his heart.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I think I said not that I had been the subject of denunciation but that I was subjected to criticism.

Mr. BACON. Well, the criticisms were kindly and only influenced by the highest consideration for that which is within our chiefest care and guardianship—the peace and welfare of our people. But at that time, Mr. President, I endeavored to suggest to the Senator a reversal of the picture and asked him at that time what should be done under reverse conditions. I put to him the alternative picture that I now ask him again to look at, and I think it is also well for the American people to look at it, because the emotions which stir the heart of the Senator from Missouri are doubtless at work in the minds and hearts of all of our people—one of solicitude; one, I have no doubt, in a great many breasts, of indignation against such a situation and against the apparent inability upon our part to apply the remedy.

But now the alternative proposition is this: Suppose that a band of buccaneers or bandits or other outlaws had taken possession of the city of El Paso, which is on the opposite side of the river from Juarez, had overcome the local authorities, had driven whatever there was in the way of police or soldiery out of the city, had taken possession of the customhouse and of all the public buildings, had set up an independent government and defied the government of Texas and the Government of the United States and said, "We do not intend hereafter to submit to the authority of the United States until the President of the United States now in office resigns his office and puts in somebody who shall be agreeable to us and further terms which we demand are granted;" setting up that independent authority in the city of El Paso, maintaining it, and absolutely overcoming by force the local power to resist it, what would the United States Government do under such circumstances? Undoubtedly it would order its troops there for the purpose of overcoming such insurrection as that, for the purpose of restoring its authority. When its troops got there and lined up in front of El Paso the proposition would be presented: You can not attack these bandits, these outlaws, in the city of El Paso without endangering the lives of the people in the city of Juarez. As I endeavored to point out the other day, that would be a situation which would not be the situation of a day; it would not be the situation of a year; but it would be the situation of all time, because those conditions would exist as long as the two cities of El Paso and Juarez occupy their present relative positions.

What would the Government of the United States do under such circumstances? Can it be for a moment suggested that that absolutely necessary consequence would deter the Government of the United States from reasserting by armed force its authority in the city of El Paso? Doubtless, moved by humanity, our authorities would give notice to the people of Juarez that they were going to attack; that the consequence of such attack would be that those who remained in the city of Juarez would be in danger, and that they would be given opportunity to remove themselves to a place of safety; but beyond that there is no possibility of doubt as to what the Government of the United States would do. There is no possibility of doubt as to what the Government of the United States should do, and what would be criminally negligent if it failed to do. It must reassert its authority, and it would reassert its authority by armed force, using the engines of war, and it would not be deterred by the fact that in so doing lives would be endangered on the other side of the Rio Grande.

Mr. President, I do not know that those who are engaged in this fratricidal strife on the other side of the Rio Grande have given formal notice to the people of El Paso, but they certainly have had notice that the federal forces and the insurrectos are going to fight there. The Senator from Missouri asks what are we to do but wait to-day in trepidation, with bated breath, to know what other slaughter has been done upon our side of the Rio Grande as a consequence of the conflict which is going on. Well, it may not be exactly in accordance with what we would like to do, but a simple thing to do, if human life is the only thing at stake, and is the principal thing at stake, is for the people of El Paso to go beyond the reach of the bullets—a thing they can do in 15 minutes. It is not very gratifying to contemplate that they should have to take such action, but what else can be done?

I have no doubt, Mr. President, that in the case which I suggested when I endeavored to present the first picture, if the Government of the United States should take such a step, it would recognize the fact that whatever of damage was done to the people of Mexico by reason of the legitimate and proper assertion of its authority through forces at El Paso would be paid for. It could not be paid for adequately. No money can pay for the loss of human life, and yet it is only in such way that governments can make even an apparent compensation. It is the kind of compensation which has been recognized from all time as the only compensation which is practicable. I have no doubt that the Government of the United States will endeavor to see that the damage that has been done in El Paso, so far as it is practicable to be repaired, shall be repaired.

Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri speaks about the loss of human life. Does the Senator for a moment pause to think of what would be the loss of human life if Federal troops should cross the Rio Grande under the authority of the United States? In such event there are two ways in which human life would be lost. In my opinion, the man who thinks that the Army of the United States, or even a very small part of it, can be sent across the Rio Grande without plunging the two countries into war is very optimistic in his disposition. Whenever the troops of the United States cross the river the match has been applied to the magazine and the explosion will certainly follow. I commend the President of the United States without qualification and without stint for his utterances, or those which he is reported to have made and which I know he has to a degree made, in which he has asserted his determination that until the Congress of the United States, the authority clothed by the Constitution with the power to make war, and the only authority clothed with that power, says that war shall be undertaken he will not order the troops to cross the border.

The Senator from Missouri speaks in the alternative of the failure of the President and of Congress to act under recent and present conditions. There is no alternative authority; there is but one authority in such a contingency, and that is the Congress of the United States. The President of the United States has no right to make war. The President of the United States, even in a case of emergency, when Congress is in session, would have no right to undertake even a warlike measure. I do not agree with the Senator that Congress can not act in the absence of a request from the President. Of course, Congress looks to the President for information as to international matters, but the initiative in a measure of war, as well as the act itself by which war will be undertaken, belongs to Congress.

Mr. President, I say that the Senator or the individual who thinks that the American troops can cross the border and not plunge this country into war is optimistic, and when plunged into war the lives which would be sacrificed would be incomparably greater in number than those which can possibly be sacrificed under the distressing conditions which now exist on the Mexican border.

But, Mr. President, there is another view of it when you come to consider the question of human life. I do not know how many American citizens there are within the territory of Mexico, but there are a very large number—many, yes, very many thousands scattered all about through Mexico. There are thousands of them in the City of Mexico alone. They are there engaged in a great many enterprises. It is not too much to say that, however the Mexican people may be divided, they are united upon one proposition, and that is opposition to invasion of their country by the Army of the United States; and the moment the United States undertook an intervention there would be a flame of resentment which would light up that entire country and set it in a blaze. What would be the effect upon the vast number of Americans who are scattered all over the Republic of Mexico? We have had information by Americans who have recently come from that country that so soon as that condition should develop every American in Mexico would hold his life at the mercy of that inflamed and hostile people, as they then would be. The life of every American in the Republic of Mexico would be in imminent peril.

Mr. President, we must look not to the accomplishment of some temporary and immediate purpose, but we must look at what must be the necessary result if we begin such an undertaking. Suppose we cross the border for the purpose of protecting the people on our side of the border. When we get on the other side, into the city of Juarez, what position will the American Army take? We recognize the authority of the Government of Mexico, and that is the only authority we recognize on the other side of the Rio Grande. Those who are in revolution or in rebellion are not recognized by the Government of the United States even as belligerents. When the Army of the United States crosses the border, there would be but one authority that that Army could recognize, and that would be the authority of the existing Government. Necessarily the Government of the United States in ordering its troops across the border must from this fact take the position of restoring authority by putting down those who are in rebellion against that authority. Is it the part of the United States Government to take part in that strife and to say to those who are in rebellion—those who are attempting to make a successfull revolution—"You are endangering the safety of our citizens, of our country in your battles on the border, and therefore we will assist the Mexican Government in putting you down"? That is the only position that the American troops and the American authorities could take. We can not go there and say we will take part with the revolutionists; and, I think, Mr. President, it would be only less improper for us to go there and say we will take part against the revolutionists. It is a God-given, a natural right to any people to attempt to throw off a government if they find that government burdensome and tyrannical. What, then, are we to do if we go across other than to take one or the other position, either of which would be an absolutely and utterly untenable one?

I repeat, Mr. President, what I said the other day, that to adopt the resolution offered by the Senator from Missouri, and which is still—I have forgotten whether it is on the table or has been referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations—and I will ask the Senator as to that——

Mr. STONE. The resolution has been referred to the committee.

Mr. BACON. To adopt that resolution, which authorizes the President—I am not sure whether it merely authorizes him or goes still further and directs him—to order the Army to cross the border, is a declaration of war. That is the way in which declarations of war are made, and it is the only way in which declarations of war are made. It is by directing the Executive to make war; authorizing him to make war. That is war.

Mr. President, I can conceive of no greater curse to befall this country than a war with any people, but among the greatest of all curses would be a war with the people of Mexico, our immediate neighbors, between whom and ourselves there exists only in part an imaginary line and in the other part a narrow river which can be forded.

As suggested to me by my friend from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] who sits in front of me, if we go to Mexico and put up the flag, who thinks it will ever be hauled down? Have we not got trouble enough on our hands now as the fruits of war?

Sir, I think when the historian comes to write the history of the past 13 years he will say that our little War with Spain did more to revolutionize the political institutions and the constitutional limitations of the United States than did the great Civil War, or all the wars combined which we have had since the foundation of the Government. For us again to be plunged into war is not only to bring about a great effusion of blood, not only to disturb the relations which should exist between us and our neighboring Republic, and I may add also the relations which exist between us and all of the Republics to the south of us to the extreme end of Patagonia; not only that, but we are to jeopardize, and not simply to jeopardize, Mr. President, but certainly to injure and jeopardize our own institutions.

I repeat, it is not a situation with which we are satisfied. It is not a situation that we would not like to change. It is a situation with which we are dissatisfied and a situation which we would like greatly to change. But it is better to—

> Bear those ills we have
> Than fly to others that we know not of.

Aye, Mr. President, I might put it stronger than that. It is better to bear the ills we have than to fly to ills that we know of a thousandfold greater. We have got to bear the situation with the best temper and with the best judgment possible.

Mr. President, in my opinion the highest duty of the American people at this time, so far as that situation is concerned, is to avoid that which will intensify or aggravate it in any way; that we should say to that people: "While we deplore it, we do not desire in any manner to interfere with you in your internecine strife; we wish for your prosperity; we wish for your peace; we wish for the establishment of institutions which shall conduce most to your prosperity. In the meantime we earnestly hope that nothing shall occur to produce, and shall endeavor to contribute all in our power to prevent anything which shall produce, friction between the two countries." And to our own people, when a fight is on the other side: "Do not climb the housetops and the trees as spectators to witness the combat. But as it is something in which we can not take part, as it is something in which we are not the combatants, as it is something in which a retreat from the scene of danger does not involve any possible presentation of a feeling of cowardice or intimidation, when the battle comes, if come it must, get out of the way of danger until it is over. That is the best that can now be done. And whatever damage comes, whatever injury is inflicted, in time we will endeavor to the best of our ability to see that you have reparation."

I can conceive of nothing else we can do. I can conceive of no better advice we can now give them. It is a situation, I repeat, with which we are not satisfied, but it is one calling for the greatest caution, the greatest conservatism, the greatest patience, and the greatest forbearance.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I have the honor to represent in part one of the States that border on the territory of the Mexican Government. I desire to add a few words to what has been said by the distinguished Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON]. There are hundreds of citizens of my State now within the borders of the Mexican Government. I am receiving telegrams and letters from my people there protesting against the sending of our troops into Mexican territory, and they place it upon the ground that instead of protecting the lives of our people by taking action of that kind, the lives of every American citizen within the borders of the Mexican Government would thereby be put in peril. Laying aside all question of the troops themselves, more of the lives of our people would be lost by entering into the territory of the Mexican Government than by remaining out and allowing these casualties to occur that are sacrificing only a very few.

I desire, for my own part, to commend the wisdom and forbearance of the President of the United States in withholding the hand of this Government under the circumstances that exist at the present time. It requires and calls for wisdom and forbearance on his part, because the desire to protect the lives of our own citizens must be strong upon him as it is upon that of every good citizen of the country. But the best thing that can happen to this country at the present time is to withhold its hand, allow the Mexican Government to settle its own difficulties without any interference upon our part.

If we should enter upon the territory of the Mexican Government to-day, what would be our position? Would it be in support of the Mexican Government against the insurgents, or would it be in favor and in the interest of the insurgents against the Mexican Government, or would it be absolutely independent of both of their forces and for the purpose of protecting the lives of our own people? In either event it would involve us, as has been said here, in a war that must necessarily be prolonged, probably for years to come, and the lives of thousands of American citizens would be sacrificed if we are tempted to take that course because a few lives have already been lost. In my judgment, it would be a grave mistake.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] said that if American soldiers should be sent across the border line for any purpose it might, and probably would, involve this country in a war with Mexico. And the Senator from California [Mr. WORKS] is of the opinion that it would involve us in a war that might be protracted through many years. I do not share in these apprehensions, but upon these Senators the fear of war operates as a deterrent; it is the thing which holds them in check. They are not willing to take the hazard of a conflict with Mexico even though our own people may be in dire distress and in sore need of our protection. They are unwilling to take that hazard even though American women and children are killed in their homes by Mexicans on our border.

Mr. President, there was a time in the history of this country when Americans were made of more rugged stuff. There was a time when they would take the hazard of war if it were necessary to protect the life or liberty of a single citizen whose life or liberty was in peril. Then the American flag was indeed an emblem of protection and a symbol of safety. Are we of this generation made of such soft material that we dare not lift our hands to protect our people, fearing, forsooth, that it might involve us in war? If that be true, then we are indeed degenerate sons of noble sires! If that be true, we no longer have the spirit of our fathers!

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. STONE. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to ask the Senator from Missouri whether he thinks that any life has been endangered or taken by the deliberate purpose, either of the revolutionists or of the federalists, in Mexico, or whether, upon the other hand, such life as has been lost has not been lost through mere accident and incident?

Mr. STONE. According to newspaper reports the lives of Americans have been deliberately taken in Mexico. But if the Senator from Mississippi refers to those who were killed at Douglas and El Paso, as I presume he does, I would not assert that any shots were fired deliberately, premeditatedly, and maliciously for the purpose of killing people on this side of the line.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

Mr. STONE. Let me finish. But I do say that when the attack was so made as inevitably to occasion the injury which resulted, and when those who inflicted the injury manifested such supreme indifference to the safety of the unoffending residents of El Paso as was shown in this instance, the practical effect is in every way as bad as if it had been deliberately intended.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator from Missouri will grant me permission, I did refer, of course, to the lives that had been taken at Douglas and at El Paso. I was not referring to any life that had been taken upon Mexican soil by a Mexican mob, any more than I would have an Italian refer to the Italians who a few years ago were killed by a mob in New Orleans.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, if the insurrectionary or Government forces train their guns in a way that the lives and property of our people are inevitably endangered, and do this with a stolid indifference as to consequences, I can see but little difference in morals, and none in effect, between that and a deliberate firing on our people.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator from Missouri will pardon me just one moment more I will not trouble him any further. The Mexican Government, I take it, in the Senator's opinion, has a right to train its guns upon the town of Juarez. I would ask the Senator from Missouri, Is there any way for them to train those guns upon Juarez without, perhaps, incidentally injuring somebody in or around El Paso?

Mr. STONE. I presume there is a way of doing that. I have no doubt there is. But if perchance there is no way, then still I maintain that they have no right to take the lives of our people in order to accomplish their ends.

The Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] asks me to-day, as he did when this question was before the Senate a short time ago, whether, if El Paso was in the hands of buccaneers or a lawless mob, the customhouse and other Federal buildings and property taken and held by force, the Government could and should use its Army to recover possession of the city and its own property. Of course it could and should. But, Mr. President, I think the Government of the United States could and would send its military forces into and through the streets of El Paso without firing a bullet into Juarez.

Juarez is upon one shore of the Rio Grande, El Paso upon the other, a mile away. The river divides them, and at that point is the dividing line between the two countries. It seems to me that troops could be sent into the city along the river front from either side. This Government would be strong enough to recover the possession of El Paso, as it would do, without endangering a life or a dollar's worth of property on the Mexican side. At all events we would not fire on Juarez.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama and Mr. RAYNER addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missiouri yield, and to whom?

Mr. STONE. I yield first to the Senator from Alabama, as he rose first.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I desire to ask the Senator from Missouri if the insurgents attack Juarez from the river between El Paso and Juarez, what should the Mexican troops do in defending that city? Shall they not fire at all for fear that some stray shots may cross the American border?

Mr. STONE. If the insurrectionists attacked the city from the river front, of course, if the Government forces fired in defense they would necessarily fire toward El Paso. That would present the very case wherein I hold that the forces of the United States should be employed to put a stop to the conflict. But if the insurrectionary forces should assail the city of Juarez from one side or the other or from both, so that they did not fire into or upon the city of El Paso, we would then have no such interest in the situation as would afford occasion for us to interfere.

The Senator from Georgia says that if a fight is on and our people in the city in danger, they could flee the city and in 15 minutes reach a point of safety. Maybe so; but how would the people of a city having nearly 40,000 population—men and women and children, including the sick and the halt——

[At this point Mr. STONE was interrupted, the hour of 4 o'clock having arrived, when the unfinished business was laid before the Senate, and it was informally laid aside.]

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I shall not detain the Senate much longer. El Paso is a city of nearly 40,000 inhabitants. If it were a city of 100,000 inhabitants the situation as it affected the people would be practically the same, only the difficulties would be magnified. How is it possible for a population so large as that residing in that city to flee from their homes to some distant place on the plains? How would they be sheltered? How would they subsist? Would you have them driven out from the walls of their city and leave their homes and places of business at the mercy of looters or a riotous mob that might invade from either side?

The Senator from Georgia says that we can not interfere forcibly, at least that we should not so interfere. I will ask him if to-morrow the Mexicans, revolutionists or federals, should train their guns so as to sweep the streets of El Paso and slaughter our people and destroy their property——

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. STONE. In a moment. Would the Senator from Georgia be willing still to fold his hands and say for fear of greater trouble we will even bear this ill?

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, unfortunately I was called from the Chamber——

Mr. STONE. The Senator from Texas had already risen before the Senator from Georgia. If the Senator from Georgia will permit, I will first yield to the Senator from Texas and then to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. BAILEY. I simply wanted to say to the Senator from Missouri that if either federals or insurrectos train their guns on El Paso the population of that city will perhaps relieve the Government of the United States from precipitating hostilities.

Mr. STONE. I will say to the Senator from Texas that an order has been printed in the newspapers, purporting to come from the War Department, directing the commanding officer at El Paso so to use the forces under his control as to prevent the people of the city of El Paso from taking that matter into their own hands.

Mr. BAILEY. I can well understand that the War Department would take measures to prevent the people of El Paso from becoming the aggressors, but all the orders issued by the War Department since the foundation of this Government could not restrain those people from defending their lives and their homes if they are attacked.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I hope that is true. But the Government of the United States, with a strong force of well-equipped troops there on the border line and in El Paso, should not throw that responsibility upon the people of Texas. The Government of the United States should itself assume and discharge that international duty. At the very least the Government should not throw its line between the men of El Paso and the troops in Mexico, and thus compel the people of the city to keep the peace at whatever cost or else face the hostile guns of our own troops in order to defend themselves against those who were butchering their wives and children.

Now, I will repeat the question I asked my friend from Georgia. If the guns of the Mexican troops, whether of one side or the other, or of both sides, should be so trained as to sweep the streets of El Paso as well as the streets of Juarez, what, then, would the Senator advise?

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I do not know that I could make my meaning clearer by replying to the Senator's question than I endeavored to make it in the remarks which I submitted in reply to his first observations. Anything which is done by the contending forces in good faith on the part of each in its struggle with the other to accomplish the overthrow of the other would not be an act of war against this Government, however much we might deplore the unfortunate results. Of course, if they were trained for the purpose——

Mr. STONE. No; not for the purpose, but with the inevitable result.

Mr. BACON. Very well. I say, Mr. President, that whenever there is a struggle in Juarez between contending forces there must necessarily be danger to the people in El Paso. Whenever there might be hereafter a struggle between contending forces in El Paso there must be danger to the people of Juarez. It is one of the incidents of war. War is no play or pastime, and its results and consequences are inevitable. They are to be deplored to the last degree; but notwithstanding, nations must govern themselves with a view to those things which are necessarily incident to it.

Mr. STONE. If I understand the Senator, he says in effect that instead of the Government of the United States interfering for the protection of the people of El Paso the people of El Paso should run away from their homes and abandon their city.

Mr. BACON. The purpose of the honorable and learned Senator is, of course, to put the proposition in a way which will make it offensive to the natural manhood of the American people. I do not suggest that they should run away, but I would not advise them to be very particular in the order of their going. However, as it is a struggle in which they take no part, or should take no part, in which they have no personal concern, they can not be said to be running away from an enemy. They can not be said to be declining a conflict with an enemy. They are doing just as the Senator would do if two men should meet on the street and begin to fire at each other with revolvers. The Senator would be quick to get inside of a door.

Mr. STONE. I would.

Mr. BACON. And he would not say he was running away when he did it.

Mr. STONE. But I will say that if I were in the shelter of my own home and two men began deliberately firing, though ostensibly and professedly at each other, through my house, endangering the lives of my family, and I had a shotgun I would protect myself.

Mr. BACON. That might be, because no two men have a right to fight on the street. But two peoples have a right to fight on the territory of Mexico.

However, I will make another suggestion. If the Senator were standing in his own front door and two men should get to fighting on the street, I imagine the Senator would very quickly retreat to a back room and not consider that he was running away.

Mr. STONE. Oh, I might do that. Yes; I think I should do that. But the question the Senator lightly states is in no sense parallel to the grave question we are considering here.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. STONE. Certainly.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I should like to ask the distinguished Senator from Missouri what he intends to do with the treaty of Guadalupe-Hidalgo, entered into between the United States and Mexico in 1848, which involved the very territory which is now in danger and provides a method and means for the two countries to get together in case of commercial or political difficulties? That way has not yet been followed out by the President, nor has it been suggested by the Senator from Missouri, but on the contrary he advocates its entire violation.

Mr. STONE. I do not see that the treaty of Guadalupe-Hidalgo, for the most part a commercial treaty, has any connection whatever with the case in hand. It is wholly inapplicable.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield further to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. STONE. Certainly.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It expressly provides for just such an emergency as now exists on the border line.

Mr. STONE. Does the Senator mean to say that it provides for what action should be taken by the two Governments to prevent the slaughter of our people under the circumstances prevailing there?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Pretty nearly. It is broad enough to cover that and every other contingency that might happen.

Mr. STONE. How long would we have to wait for this action while the killing was in progress?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. We would not have to wait at all. It is provided that in case——

Mr. STONE. Will the Senator read it?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will ask the Secretary to read it, and the Senator from Missouri will see that it covers every contingency that might happen.

Mr. STONE. How long is it?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It is only about a page and a half.

Mr. STONE. I think I would rather have it inserted in the RECORD without reading.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I will ask that it be inserted in the RECORD. I felt that the Senator would prefer to have that done, because it contradicts his position.

Mr. STONE. Well, we will see about that to-morrow morning. If it does contradict what I have said, it will be a strange and most unexpected contradiction. I will have to be shown.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the matter indicated by the Senator from Oregon will be inserted in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

ARTICLE XXI.

If unhappily any disagreement should hereafter arise between the Governments of the two Republics, whether with respect to the interpretation of any stipulation in this treaty or with respect to any other particular concerning the political or commercial relations of the two nations, the said Governments, in the name of those nations, do promise to each other that they will endeavor, in the most sincere and earnest manner, to settle the differences so arising and to preserve the state of peace and friendship in which the two countries are now placing themselves, using for this end mutual representations and pacific negotiations. And if by these means they should not be enabled to come to an agreement, a resort shall not on this account be had to reprisals, aggression, or hostility of any kind by the one Republic against the other until the Government of that which deems itself aggrieved shall have maturely considered, in the spirit of peace and good neighborship, whether it would not be better that such difference should be settled by the arbitration of commissioners appointed on each side or by that of a friendly nation. And should such course be proposed by either party it shall be acceded to by the other, unless deemed by it altogether incompatible with the nature of the difference or the circumstances of the case.

ARTICLE XXII.

If (which is not to be expected and which God forbid) war should unhappily break out between the two Republics they do now, with a view to such calamity, solemnly pledge themselves to each other and to the world to observe the following rules absolutely where the nature of the subject permits, and as closely as possible in all cases where such absolute observance shall be impossible:

1. The merchants of either Republic then residing in the other shall be allowed to remain 12 months (for those dwelling in the interior) and six months (for those dwelling at the seaports) to collect their debts and settle their affairs; during which periods they shall enjoy the same protection, and be on the same footing, in all respects, as the citizens or subjects of the most friendly nations; and at the expiration thereof, or at any time before, they shall have full liberty to depart, carrying off all their effects, without molestation or hindrance, conforming therein to the same laws which the citizens or subjects of the most friendly nations are required to conform to. Upon the entrance of the armies of either nation into the territories of the other, women and children, ecclesiastics, scholars of every faculty, cultivators of the earth, merchants, artisans, manufacturers, and fishermen, unarmed and inhabiting unfortified towns, villages, or places, and in general all persons whose occupations are for the common subsistence and benefit of mankind, shall be allowed to continue their respective employments unmolested in their persons. Nor shall their houses or goods be burnt or otherwise destroyed, nor their cattle taken, nor their fields wasted by the armed force into whose power by the events of war they may happen to fall, but if the necessity arise to take anything from them for the use of such armed force, the same shall be paid for at an equitable price. All churches, hospitals, schools, colleges, libraries, and other establishments for charitable and beneficent purposes shall be respected, and all persons connected with the same protected in the discharge of their duties and the pursuit of their vocations.

2. In order that the fate of prisoners of war may be alleviated, all such practices as those of sending them into distant, inclement, or unwholesome districts, or crowding them into close and noxious places, shall be studiously avoided. They shall not be confined in dungeons, prison ships, or prisons; nor be put in irons, or bound, or otherwise restrained in the use of their limbs. The officers shall enjoy liberty on their paroles, within convenient districts, and have comfortable quarters; and the common soldier shall be disposed in cantonments, open and extensive enough for air and exercise, and lodged in barracks as roomy and good as are provided by the party in whose power they are for its own troops. But if any officer shall break his parole by leaving the district so assigned him, or any other prisoner shall escape from the limits of his cantonment, after they shall have been designated to him, such individual, officer, or other prisoner shall forfeit so much of the benefit of this article as provides for his liberty on parole or in cantonment. And if any officer so breaking his parole, or any common soldier so escaping from the limits assigned him, shall afterwards be found in arms, previously to his being regularly exchanged, the person so offending shall be dealt with according to the established laws of war. The officers shall be daily furnished, by the party in whose power they are, with as many rations, and of the same articles, as are allowed, either in kind or by commutation, to officers of equal rank in its own army; and all others shall be daily furnished with such ration as is allowed to a common soldier in its own service; the value of all which supplies shall, at the close of the war, or at periods to be agreed upon between the respective commanders, be paid by the other party, on a mutual adjustment of accounts for the subsistence of prisoners; and such accounts shall not be mingled with or set off against any others, nor the balance due on them be witheld, as a compensation or reprisal for any cause whatever, real or pretended. Each party shall be allowed to keep a commissary of prisoners, appointed by itself, with every cantonment of prisoners, in possession of the other, which commissary shall see the prisoners as often as he pleases; shall be allowed to receive, exempt from all duties or taxes, and to distribute, whatever comforts may be sent to them by their friends; and shall be free to transmit his reports in open letters to the party by whom he is employed.

And it is declared that neither the pretense that war dissolves all treaties, nor any other whatever, shall be considered as annulling or suspending the solemn covenant contained in this article. On the contrary, the state of war is precisely that for which it is provided, and, during which, its stipulations are to be as sacredly observed as the most acknowledged obligations under the law of nature or nations.

Mr. STONE. The Senator from Georgia says that the President is without authority to order troops across the Rio Grande. Grant it. But the resolution I proposed was ultimately intended to confer congressional authority upon the President to take such action, if the necessity for taking it should arise.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

Mr. STONE. I am not reproaching anyone. I am simply complaining that the Congress stands here inert.

Mr. BACON. And does not declare war.

Mr. HEYBURN. I merely desire to make a request. It appears that it is directly connected with the subject under discussion, and I should like very much if that provision in the treaty of 1848 could be read.

Mr. CULLOM. Let it be read to-morrow, not to-day.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am asking that it be read to-day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the reading?

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I will not detain the Senate by consenting to having it read at this time, as the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] has informed me that he is anxious to take up another matter before we adjourn.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator object?

Mr. STONE. We can all read it ourselves in the RECORD in the morning.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator object to the reading?

Mr. STONE. It will take some time to have it read. I think it is better to have it printed without reading.

Mr. President, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] suggested to the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] that if we ever crossed the line into Mexico we would take territory from Mexico and annex it. Not necessarily; not probably. That would be as improbable as anything I can conceive of. There is no desire, much less purpose, on the part of the American people or any of them, so far as I have ever heard, to acquire additional territory from Mexico. I do not want Mexican territory; I would not have it; but I do want our people protected from the guns of a reckless Mexican soldiery.

The proposition submitted to the Senate was not to invade Mexico for the purpose of occupying or acquiring territory, but to put an end to any conflict raging on the border and involving the safety of our people. Whenever that end is accomplished I have said that we should immediately withdraw our forces to our own territory. If that kind of humane interference should lead to a conflict between the two countries, we would, of course, have to face the peril and meet the issue.

Now, sir, I do not want war any more than the Senator from Georgia. I am as much opposed to war as he, but I do want this Government to exercise the sovereign function of protecting its own people.

ELECTION OF SENATORS BY DIRECT VOTE.

During the delivery of Mr. STONE's speech,

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri will suspend for a moment. The hour of 4 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A joint resolution (H. J. Res. 39) proposing an amendment to the Constitution providing that Senators shall be elected by the people of the several States.

Mr. BORAH. Will the Senator from Missouri yield for just a moment, until I make a statement?

Mr. STONE. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I think I ought to say that while I am not going to urge the consideration of this measure to-day, not later than Thursday it is my purpose to test the sense of the Senate from time to time that we may remain in session during the regular hours of the session until the measure is disposed of. In other words, I shall not feel that I am privileged to ask to have this matter laid aside at any time after Thursday.

The joint resolution was before the last Congress, as we all know, and it was voted upon after a very thorough discussion. Upon the first day of the present session several resolutions covering the general subject matter were introduced, and, of course, everyone understood that it would be up for consideration. I shall not feel, therefore, that I am urging the matter with any undue haste by pressing a continuous consideration of the measure on Thursday.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to ask the Senator a question. Are we to understand that the Senator will be content to occupy the time allotted for unfinished business, or that he will ask that the Senate not only occupy that time, but some other time?

Mr. BORAH. The question is a very pertinent one. I want to occupy all the possible time, except the actual sleeping hours, until it is disposed of.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is, the Senator has taken advantage of the right under the vote to make it the unfinished business. He is not content with that; he not only wants to occupy the time of the Senate which under the rule is devoted to the unfinished business, but he wants to displace all other business. Well, we understand it.

Mr. BORAH. There is no other business to be displaced so far as the present condition of affairs is concerned. I do not think the Senator in charge of the joint resolution can be charged with undue haste. I think that the vote which we had yesterday shows it to be the sense of the Senate that we should dispose of this matter. Otherwise, we would not have had so strong a vote as we did. I feel, therefore, that I should urge it, of course at all times considering the convenience of my colleague as much as I can do so.

Mr. HEYBURN. I presume the Senator does not take into consideration the vote by which this measure was rejected in the Senate at the last session.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; I had not overlooked that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Did the Senator from Idaho intend to ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside?

Mr. BORAH. I will ask that it be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. If there is no objection, that order is made.

ADJOURNMENT TO THURSDAY.

After the conclusion of Mr. STONE'S speech,

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, a considerable number of Senators have suggested that the business of the Senate will be expedited rather than retarded by adjourning over until Thursday. The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] has laid aside the matter in which he is interested until that time, and if there be no serious objection, I will make the motion. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Thursday next.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 10 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Thursday, May 11, 1911, at 2 o'clock p. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, May 9, 1911.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Out of the deeps of our being, O God our Father, we thank Thee for the gospel of love which poured itself out in all fullness on the cross of Calvary, the very heart of God revealed, the crown of all humanity, so subtle, so profound, so gentle, so potent that the slightest touch purifies, enriches, ennobles the soul and makes the whole world akin. Quicken, we beseech Thee, our susceptibilities that we may receive more abundantly, that we may become like unto the Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

BUILDING FOR BUREAU OF ENGRAVING AND PRINTING.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a privileged report (H. Rept. 22).

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas submits a privileged report from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred House resolution 123 calling for information as to the plans and specifications for a new building for the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, having considered the same reports thereon with the recommendation that it do pass.

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order. These matters that are transacted here the first thing every morning are of a great deal of importance, and there is more chance of mistakes about them than any other species of legislation that we have here, and the order ought to be perfect while they are being reported. The Clerk will read the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 123.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to inform the House of Representatives of the action taken by the Treasury Department to have erected a building for the Bureau of Engraving and Printing under the authority heretofore given by Congress; whether plans and specifications have been prepared and approved for said building; whether detailed estimates of the cost of said building have been made; whether bids for the construction of said building have been invited and obtained, and what action, if any, has been taken thereon; and whether plans have been proposed, prepared, adopted, or approved which are not in accordance with the requirements of the "act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government and for other purposes," approved March 27, 1908.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. Speaker, a new building for the Bureau of Engraving and Printing was authorized and appropriated for nearly three years ago. Conditions in the existing building were pronounced intolerable then, Secretary Shaw stating that it was one of the worst sweatshops in the world, but despite the fact that an appropriation was made then, and despite the fact that conditions have grown more intolerable with the years, no steps have been taken apparently by the Treasury Department to construct the building as originally designed, and the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds believes the House is entitled to know why the building has not been constructed.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Texas yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I do.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. May I inquire if the gentleman knows whether it is claimed it is impossible to build this building for the appropriation which was made by Congress?

Mr. SHEPPARD. It is not. It is claimed that it is impossible to build it with an ornamental style of architecture.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. With the plans that have been submitted to the department? Is that the understanding?

Mr. SHEPPARD. The first plans that were prepared were entirely within the original appropriation, but after the advent of a certain fine-arts commission, with technical ideas of art and architecture, and with too little regard for the needs of the 4,000 employees of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, the plans were changed.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Was that the fine-arts commission that was created by Congress?

Mr. SHEPPARD. It was created by an Executive order, if I am correctly informed.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. And not by an act of Congress?

Mr. SHEPPARD. No, sir.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] yield to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS]?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. NORRIS. Under the law providing for the building of this new building, was the place where it was to be built stipulated?

Mr. SHEPPARD. It was.

Mr. NORRIS. Where was it to be?

Mr. SHEPPARD. On the squares directly south of the square on which the present buildings are located. The site has been purchased, I will say to the gentleman, and the money for the building has been appropriated, with the exception of, perhaps, $100,000.

Mr. NORRIS. When was the site purchased?

Mr. SHEPPARD. It was purchased soon after the initial authorization of March 27, 1908.

Mr. NORRIS. It has been some three years, then, since the site was purchased?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Yes, sir.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Texas yield to the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield.

Mr. SIMS. I would like to ask the gentleman from Texas what authority the Fine Arts Commission has to interfere with the execution of an act of Congress?

Mr. SHEPPARD. It has none whatever.

Mr. SIMS. Why do the department officials fail to execute a law and give as an excuse the interference of the Fine Arts Commission?

Mr. SHEPPARD. It is the object of this resolution to find out why a specific authorization of Congress has not been obeyed.

Mr. SIMS. Does the Fine Arts Commission undertake to interfere with all kinds of public buildings and as to the method of their construction?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I am unable to say.

Mr. SIMS. You do not know whether they get down to the public-comfort stations or not?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I do not. But I think this resolution ought to be passed in order that Congress should know why its specific laws can not be executed by department officials.

Mr. KENDALL rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Texas yield to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield.

Mr. KENDALL. I want to make an inquiry for information. Has the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds had any communication with the Treasury Department with reference to the bill?

Mr. SHEPPARD. It has.

Mr. KENDALL. Has the department failed to respond to the inquiry of the committee with reference to its reasons for postponing the construction of this building?

Mr. SHEPPARD. It has responded in a measure. This resolution was introduced, however, by the chairman of the Appropriations Committee, which made this original appropriation, and we believe it ought to pass through the official channels and that the department ought officially to respond to this inquiry on the part of the committee making the initial appropriation.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Texas yield to the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Certainly.

Mr. AUSTIN. I would ask the gentleman to state that this is a unanimous report, and that there is no opposition on the part of the minority of the committee to the passage of this resolution.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Exactly. This is a unanimous report of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

NAVY CONTRACTS FOR SHOES.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I wish to submit a privileged report (H. Rept. 23) from the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee, chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, submits a privileged report from that committee, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the substitute resolution be read instead of the original.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the substitute resolution, and then the report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 151.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, directed to send to the House of Representatives full information, as follows:

First. What proportion of the contracts for Navy shoes during the fiscal years 1901 to 1911, inclusive, were awarded to the firm of Hermann & Co.?

Second. What are the names of the individuals, firms, or corporations who have secured contracts for Navy shoes in the fiscal years 1901 to 1911, inclusive, and the amount and quantity of each contract?

Third. Were any competitors blacklisted or disqualified from bidding on any Navy shoe contract in the fiscal years 1901 to 1911, inclusive? If so, what were the names of those competitors and what was the cause of their disqualification?

Fourth. What proportion of the Navy shoe contracts in the fiscal years 1901 to 1911, inclusive, were awarded to the lowest bidders?

Fifth. How many bidders were there for the Navy shoe contracts for the fiscal years 1901 to 1911, inclusive? Furnish complete list of all bidders and of all original and amended bids.

Sixth. If the bids were invited by advertisement, furnish copies of the advertisements.

NAVY CONTRACTS FOR SHOES.

Mr. PADGETT, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, submitted the following report (to accompany H. Res. 151):

The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred House resolution 151, relating to contracts for Navy shoes, having considered the same, report it back with the following amendment, and, as amended, recommend that it do pass:

Strike out all after the word "Resolved," of said resolution and in lieu thereof insert the following:

"That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, directed to send to the House of Representatives full information, as follows:

"First. What proportion of the contracts for Navy shoes during the fiscal years 1901 to 1911, inclusive, were awarded to the firm of Hermann & Co.?

"Second. What are the names of the individuals, firms, or corporations who have secured contracts for Navy shoes in the fiscal years 1901 to 1911, inclusive, and the amount and quantity of each contract?

"Third. Were any competitors blacklisted or disqualified from bidding on any Navy shoe contract in the fiscal years 1901 to 1911, inclusive? If so, what were the names of those competitors and what was the cause of their disqualification?

"Fourth. What proportion of the Navy shoe contracts in the fiscal years 1901 to 1911, inclusive, were awarded to the lowest bidders?

"Fifth. How many bidders were there for the Navy shoe contracts for the fiscal years 1901 to 1911, inclusive? Furnish complete list of all bidders and of all original and amended bids.

"Sixth. If the bids were invited by advertisement, furnish copies of the advertisements."

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I wish to state that this resolution as reported is identical with the resolution that was adopted by the House a few days since, with the exception that it embraces the years from 1901 to 1911 instead of the years 1909 to 1911. It just goes back that much further.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from Nebraska?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman in what respect this resolution as reported by the committee varies from the original resolution introduced by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER], as I understand it?

Mr. PADGETT. This is the identical resolution which we reported for the gentleman from Massachusetts, only his resolution embraced the years 1909, 1910, and 1911, and this resolution goes back to 1901.

Mr. NORRIS. I asked the gentleman the question because I noticed that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER], the author of the resolution, is not present.

Mr. PADGETT. This resolution is the resolution of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DIFENDERFER], but it is in the identical language of the other resolution, except that it covers more years.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes, sir.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Is it the same resolution as was reported by the Committee on Military Affairs?

Mr. PADGETT. There is one pending, but I do not think it is reported yet.

Mr. ANTHONY and Mr. PRINCE rose.

The SPEAKER. To which gentleman, the gentleman from Kansas or the gentleman from Illinois, does the gentleman from Tennessee yield?

Mr. PADGETT. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Speaker, in answer to the inquiry of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH], I would state that a resolution similar to the one now being reported by the Committee on Naval Affairs is pending before the Committee on Military Affairs. A subcommittee has been appointed to look into the matter, and later on, at the earliest moment, they will have a hearing and dispose of it and probably later bring it into the House.

Mr. ANTHONY and Mr. FOSS rose.

The SPEAKER. To whom does the gentleman from Tennessee yield—the gentleman from Kansas or the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. PADGETT. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to inquire if the committee has made any investigation of the matter before reporting out the resolution?

Mr. PADGETT. This resolution, Mr. Speaker, simply calls upon the department to furnish any information that is in the possession of the department.

Mr. ANTHONY. But the Committee on Naval Affairs has made no investigation of this subject?

Mr. PADGETT. It has not.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. PADGETT. I do.

Mr. FOSS. I want to say to the Members of the House that this resolution has been considered by the Committee on Naval Affairs and comes here with the unanimous report of the committee.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. MANN. As I understand, this resolution is the same as the resolution that was heretofore passed, introduced by the gentleman from Massachusetts and amended in the House, except that it goes back a little further in point of time.

Mr. PADGETT. It is identical.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Massachusetts, in discussing the resolution the other day before the Committee on Military Affairs, stated that it was perfectly satisfactory to him to make that amendment on that resolution pending before the Committee on Military Affairs, and undoubtedly he will be satisfied with it, coming from the gentlemen of the committee.

Mr. PADGETT. I suppose he would be.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the House—and it may elucidate this matter a little—that this morning the Chair received from the Navy Department a response to that first resolution. The Chair forgot to bring it in, but will bring it in later in the day. The question is on agreeing to the substitute resolution offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The question was taken, and the substitute resolution was agreed to.

INVESTIGATION OF VIOLATIONS OF THE ANTITRUST ACT.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a privileged report (H. Rept. 24) from the Committee on Rules on House resolution 157.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee submits a privileged resolution and report thereon from the Committee on Rules, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolution 157 (H. Rept. 24).

Resolved, That a committee of nine members, to be elected by the House, be, and is hereby, directed to make an investigation for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not there have been violations of the antitrust act of July 2, 1890, and the various acts supplementary thereto, by the American Sugar Refining Co., incorporated January 10, 1891, under the laws of the State of New Jersey, and the various corporations controlled thereby or holding stocks or bonds therein or whose stocks or bonds are held, in whole or in part, thereby, and all other persons or corporations engaged in manufacturing or refining sugar and their relations with each other, which said violations have not been prosecuted by the executive officers of the Government.

Said committee is also directed to investigate the organization and operations of said American Sugar Refining Co., and its relations with other persons or corporations engaged in the business of manufacturing or refining sugar, and all other persons or corporations engaged in manufacturing or refining sugar and their relations with each other, and if in connection therewith violations of the aforesaid laws are disclosed, to report same to the House.

Said committee shall also inquire whether the organization and operations of the American Sugar Refining Co. and other persons or corporations having relations with it, and all other persons or corporations engaged in manufacturing or refining sugar and their relations with each other, have caused or had a tendency to cause any of the following results:

First. The restriction or destruction of competition among manufacturers or refiners of sugar.

Second. An increase in price of refined sugar to the consumer or decrease in the price of sugar cane or sugar beets to the producer thereof.

And said committee shall report to the House all the facts and circumstances disclosed by the investigation herein provided, with such recommendations as it may deem advisable.

And said committee as a whole, or any subcommittee thereof, is authorized to sit during sessions of the House and the recess of Congress, to employ clerical and other assistance, to compel the attendance of witnesses, to send for persons and papers, and to administer oaths to witnesses.

The Speaker shall have authority to sign, and the Clerk to attest, subpœnas during the recess of Congress.

Mr. HENRY of Texas, from the Committee on Rules, submitted the following:

The Committee on Rules, to whom was referred House resolution 157, to investigate violations of the antitrust act of 1890 and other acts, have considered the same and beg leave to report with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask what time, if any, the gentleman desires for the discussion of the resolution?

Mr. MANN. I would like a few minutes myself. I do not know whether there is anybody else on this side who desires time or not.

Mr. DALZELL. I do not desire time.

Mr. ESCH rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I yield for a question.

Mr. ESCH. Is this committee to be elected by the House, or to be chosen by the two sides of the House, and if so, in what proportions?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. It is to be a committee of nine members, and I may say that it is the intention of this side of the House to give four members to that side of the House and five to this side.

Mr. ESCH. The resolution does not specify.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. The resolution does not specify, but that will undoubtedly be done. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I have no possible objection to the investigation of the American Sugar Refining Co. As I suggested to the gentlemen, if they have not investigated the matter themselves, preliminary to the resolution of investigation, they may find that the investigation is one which is desired and not objected to by the Sugar Refining Co.

We have a statute providing for immunity to witnesses testifying before a committee of Congress. I am not sure whether that provision of the statute has been overruled, or decided to be unconstitutional by the Supreme Court in other cases, because we passed a subsequent act in reference to immunity to witnesses in court which goes beyond the immunity provision as to witnesses before committees.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. MANN. I gladly and always yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. HARDWICK. Does the gentleman refer to the provisions of what is commonly known as the Elkins law?

Mr. MANN. Oh, no.

Mr. HARDWICK. To what particular law then does the gentleman refer?

Mr. MANN. There is a provision in the statutes in reference to immunity to witnesses testifying before committees of Congress, a specific provision. Now, it is quite apparent——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. MANN. I do.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does not the statute provide that no testimony given by a witness before a committee of either House of Congress shall be used against him in a criminal prosecution, except a prosecution for perjury?

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will permit me to make my statement, I will get at that.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not wish to be ungracious, but I wish to inquire for information.

Mr. MANN. I notice that the moment a gentleman on the floor endeavors to give information somebody commences to ask questions for the purpose of eliciting the information which would probably be given. The gentleman from New York is correct. The statute now provides for immunity to witnesses testifying before a committee of Congress, to the extent that no testimony given by the witness can be used against him except in prosecutions for perjury. That same provision was in the statute as the testimony given in court, and under that provision the Supreme Court of the United States held that you could not compel a witness to testify, because that immunity provision was not broad enough to cover the case; that no one could be compelled to testify unless he received immunity absolutely from any charge or prosecution for the offense that might be under investigation.

Now, this investigation either will develop that under the present statute you can not compel these people to testify before the committee, or if they are brought before the committee at all and do testify they are given immunity. I think myself we ought to have remedied the statute before starting to make the investigation, so that the statute as to witnesses before a committee shall be the same as the statutes that now exist as to witnesses before a court, where complete immunity is given, if given at all, and hence testimony can be forced out of witnesses; but no immunity is given unless the witness is actually subpœnaed into court by the prosecution. Under this provision anyone who comes in and testifies will probably be declared immune from prosecution. To that extent it may render much more difficult to prosecute these sugar-refining officials who so far, some of them, have been prosecuted, others ought to be. I do not undertake to say, but undoubtedly there has been developed a large amount of fraud there which ought to be severely punished.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK].

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, the criticism suggested by the gentleman from Illinois applies, of course, to every proposed investigation by Congress with equal force that it does to this one. In other words, there is nothing in this resolution that particularly invites that criticism. Now, answering specifically the criticism of the gentleman, I wish to say this: The committee which reported this legislation has, I think, considered to some extent—and I know I have considered to some extent—the very point made by the gentleman. The law, as I understand it, is that if these witnesses—the men engaged in these enterprises which may be in violation of the Sherman antitrust law—testify before this committee their testimony can not be used against them.

The law stops there—the statute goes no further. Of course, another and much more difficult question may be raised if any one of those gentlemen, when they are brought before the committee, contend that to give evidence might tend to incriminate them. In other words, if they claim the constitutional exemption from testifying in this matter, undoubtedly if they make a case that comes within the rule they will have to be excused from testifying; but no law that Congress can pass and no resolution this House can adopt can change that rule, as the gentleman very well knows——

Mr. MANN. Oh, the gentleman will not claim we can not pass a law requiring people to testify.

Mr. HARDWICK. Providing we give them complete immunity. Now, the gentleman thinks that ought to be done. On the contrary, I take exactly the opposite position. I do not think we ought to give them immunity, nor do I think we ought to require anybody to testify to facts that incriminate him. Certainly, the proposition in the statutes to which the gentleman refers is this, that in any event the testimony given by such witness before such committee shall not be used against him in any proceeding subsequent thereto. Now, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, there are some reasons of broad and general policy why this resolution should be adopted. In the first place, in the case for "protection," as stated to the American people, one of the fundamental propositions urged in its defense is that behind the protective-tariff wall domestic production would be stimulated and domestic competition would be increased. After more than 100 years of experiment with this system, to which a great political party stands committed finally and irretrievably, what do the American people find? They find that in almost every line of industry, in almost every phase of human activity, trusts and combinations are throttling domestic competition, are stifling real competition among the producers and sellers of almost every article, and have fastened their grips upon the throats of the American people. We say that the two most conspicuous examples of that system, that has been so largely instrumental in raising the cost of living to the American people, are the Sugar Trust and the Steel Trust. We say that these two great trusts ought to be investigated, so that their operations may be made plain to the American people, so that the American people may understand from whence comes this enormous increase in the cost of living. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Take the case involved in this resolution. I think any intelligent committee that investigates this subject is bound to discover what is practically admitted by these people themselves, that this American Sugar Refining Co. and its associated and affiliated corporation, directly controls more than 50 per cent——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes more time to the gentleman.

Mr. HARDWICK (continuing). Directly controls more than 50 per cent of the total output of refined sugar in the United States of America, and indirectly controls a portion of that output variously estimated at from 70 to 90 per cent. What has happened? The price of sugar in New York is immensely higher than it is in Hamburg or in Liverpool. The American people are paying to the Sugar Trust each year many million dollars as a pure bonus that comes from the joint operation of your tariff on refined sugar and from the organization of this great combination.

Every man in this Republic, when he sits down to his breakfast table and puts sugar in his coffee or sugar in his tea or sugar on his fruit, is paying a tribute to this system that your protective-tariff system has built up and fostered to such an extent that it oppresses every American consumer. [Applause on the Democratic side.] On this side of the Chamber we say that if the prescription given in 1890 by the famous Republican statesman at the other end of this Capitol, the late Senator John Sherman, of Ohio, is efficacious, we want to use it. We say if this thing can be stopped, if this tendency to combine, to monopolize, to forestall the markets, and to engross trade can be stopped by the operation of criminal statutes, we want to know, first, why they have not been enforced, and, second, we want to see if they can not be enforced in the future, for the benefit and protection of the American people. We believe that the adoption of this resolution and the appointment of a good, strong investigating committee under its provisions will give to the various statements that are already circulated about this American Sugar Refining Co. and its allies, official stamp, and will enable the people of America, of every section and of every party, to understand how they have been oppressed in this matter, and how the protective-tariff system, with its resulting trusts and combinations, has oppressed them all.

Mr. PAYNE. I would like to ask the gentleman a question, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Georgia yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. HARDWICK. Certainly.

Mr. PAYNE. Is the resolution broad enough to enable the committee to inquire as to the retail price of sugar in the United States and the retail price of sugar, for instance, in Great Britain?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes, sir.

Mr. PAYNE. I am glad of that, because, if the gentleman will allow me——

Mr. HARDWICK. Certainly.

Mr. PAYNE (continuing). The sugar going into Great Britain, of course, goes in free of duty.

Mr. HARDWICK. No; they raise about $50,000,000, I believe, on sugar. Great Britain raises a large amount on sugar, does it not?

Mr. PAYNE. No.

Mr. HARDWICK. I will take issue with the gentleman on that.

Mr. PAYNE. It is a new duty, then.

Mr. HARDWICK. It is not very old. Now they get about $50,000,000 from sugar.

Mr. PAYNE. Two years ago it was going in free. The consular reports showed that the price in Great Britain was the same as here, and I hope the resolution is broad enough so that inquiry can be made and it can be definitely ascertained.

Mr. HARDWICK. It will cover that. And, with all due respect to the gentleman, it will demolish that contention forever, so that no Republican Representative will ever advance it on this floor.

Mr. PAYNE. The sugar duty is a revenue duty.

Mr. HARDWICK. But the differential is a trust protection.

Mr. PAYNE. It was put in as a revenue duty, with the differential protection.

Mr. HARDWICK. And the differential is a trust protection, as the gentleman well knows.

Mr. KENDALL rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Georgia yield to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. HARDWICK. Certainly.

Mr. KENDALL. I understood the gentleman to attribute the abuses which are being practiced by the Sugar Trust to the tariff on sugar?

Mr. HARDWICK. I attribute the Sugar Trust itself to the tariff also.

Mr. KENDALL. I perhaps misunderstood the gentleman the other day when I inferred from his remarks that he was in favor of a tariff on sugar.

Mr. HARDWICK. Not necessarily. I do not favor the differential, I will say to the gentleman. Of course we are obliged to raise a large amount of money on sugar in some form or other. As I understand the situation, however, there is a differential on sugar 96 per cent refined according to the Dutch standard.

Mr. KENDALL. The impression I got when the gentleman was making his tariff argument the other day was——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Georgia yield to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes.

Mr. KENDALL. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I will give the gentleman from Georgia some time if he desires to yield for a question to the gentleman from Iowa. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. KENDALL. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] was referring to the customs duties in England on coffee and on tea, and I inquired if he was in favor of adopting similar duties in the United States, and he answered affirmatively.

Mr. HARDWICK. The gentleman understood me correctly, but the gentleman did not understand me to say—because I have never entertained such an attitude—that I think the differential carried in the present law ought to be maintained.

Mr. KENDALL. I was profoundly surprised yesterday, I will say to the gentleman, when sugar was not included in the free-list bill. [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. HARDWICK. If the gentleman understood anything, he understood me to say that I was not in favor of the differential that is carried in the law. That is where the vice of the sugar duty comes in.

Mr. KENDALL. I do not think that will appear in the gentleman's speech when it is printed.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to a real investigation of the duty on sugar and as to what effect it has on the price, if it has any effect at all, outside of adding the duty thereto. Importing, as we do, the great bulk of sugar that we consume, I have no objection to an investigation touching frauds upon the revenues. In fact, I am under the impression that there have been prosecutions and convictions, where men——

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. HARDWICK. Does not the gentleman understand that the alleged customs frauds of the importers of sugar are already being investigated by one of the standing committees of this House—the committee in charge of expenditures in the Treasury Department? I wanted to direct the gentleman's attention to that.

Mr. CANNON. I did not so understand. Perhaps if that is the case there might be a question of propriety, instead of raising a new committee, of clothing that committee with jurisdiction. However, I do not recollect the personnel of that committee. I do not know how much power it has under the special resolution. I am not informed touching that matter.

I do not rise for the purpose in any way of giving my voice against any investigation touching any real or alleged abuses growing out of the operation of legislation now upon the statute books, or in spite of the legislation upon the statute books. Of course the courts are open, with practically unlimited appropriations for the enforcement of the law that we have, where, with complete process, with the law officers under the direction of the Department of Justice, there can be indictments, perchance, civil prosecutions, full hearing, and so forth.

But there is an impression that, notwithstanding the law, it is being violated, and if additional law is needed and additional information is needed to amend existing law or that will lead to more liberal appropriations, or in the event there is not efficient enforcement of the law, that might perchance lead to censure or impeachment of officials whose business it is to enforce the law, an investigation might cover all these points.

But I want to say here and now, taking the remarks of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK], that he wants an investigation to prove that an economic policy is wrong. He wants to play politics. I want this investigation, if it be held, as it evidently will be, to find out what wrongs are being committed that are not prohibited by law. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I am told—and I do not know whether this resolution is broad enough to cover such inquiries or not—that bounties are paid upon exportations of sugar, perhaps from Russia, probably from Germany, possibly from other portions of the world—on sugar that is exported to the United States. I am told——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CANNON. I should like just a little more time.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. How much more time?

Mr. CANNON. I think not over five minutes.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I yield five minutes additional to the gentleman from Illinois.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for five minutes additional.

Mr. CANNON. I am told that, for instance, in Germany, while they are large exporters and producers of sugar under bounties paid upon exports, the retail price to the consumer there is higher than the retail price to the consumer here. I do not vouch for the truth of that statement. Whether this resolution is broad enough to cover a full investigation touching sugar I do not know. If it is not, then in my judgment it ought to be amended, because this investigation is of no use whatever unless it be an investigation conducted fairly, without prejudice, for the sole purpose of ascertaining the facts, and finding whether there be abuses that require additional legislation. If the gentleman voices the intention of that side of the House touching this investigation, I am inclined to think it is to be made to show that a certain economic policy is not a wise policy; that it is to be a whoop la, for use upon the stump, to confuse the minds of people rather than to give them the facts. It will involve a large expenditure of money, and the giving out of this, that, and the other for headlines in the newspapers; an investigation for real or supposed political advantage in coming campaigns. I do not object to any political advantage that anybody can gain from an actual development of facts; but when we receive notice beforehand, on the part of the gentleman who introduces the resolution, that he wants to show that the economic policy under which this country has grown so great, in spite of now and then a dishonest man or men to be found among 92,000,000, is an unwise policy, why, that is not the proper spirit in which to commence the investigation.

I do not propose to vote against the resolution, but I merely desire to voice my protest against the spirit that is manifested by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK], because he evidently dwells in developing something, if it can be developed, for the purpose of use on the hustings and not for the purpose of use in the enforcement of the law or in amending the law if it ought to be amended. That is the function of Congress, to amend the law where it needs amendment.

Mr. HOBSON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. CANNON. Undoubtedly, with pleasure.

Mr. HOBSON. Would the gentleman make any suggestions of proposed amendments that would enable this investigation the better to arrive at the real purposes for which such an investigation should be made?

Mr. CANNON. Performing my duties to the best of my ability as a Member of Congress, I have for the first time this morning read this resolution. I believe it is reported back without amendment.

Mr. MANN. It was only introduced yesterday.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the gentleman will pardon me, it was introduced——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. CANNON. With pleasure.

Mr. HARDWICK. It was introduced in a different form some days ago. The resolution in its present form represents the work of the Committee on Rules and is unanimously reported by that committee.

Mr. CANNON. And this is a copy of it?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Reported without amendment?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Now, I am not an expert touching these matters. I would be glad to know from the gentleman, if I may be allowed to ask him, whether or not——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has again expired.

Mr. HOBSON. Will the gentleman extend the time, so that the gentleman from Illinois may answer my question?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I should be glad to, but I have no further time.

Mr. CANNON. I will ask unanimous consent for just a few minutes more.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I will yield to the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. CANNON. I will do the best I can in two minutes. I am here in no factious spirit——

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I yield to the gentleman three minutes more.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for three minutes more.

Mr. CANNON. Is the resolution broad enough to make full inquiry touching the conditions under which sugar is produced the world over, as to whether bounties are paid? Can the committee go beyond the production in the United States? Can it show what the competition is from abroad? Is the resolution broad enough to cover the whole ground?

Mr. HARDWICK. I think so, with the possible exception of the suggestion made by the gentleman from Illinois. I do not know that has affected the price, but the committee could consider that question also.

Mr. CANNON. I hope there is not any doubt about it, but I think the resolution will have to be broadened.

Mr. HARDWICK. I think it is broad enough, if the gentleman pleases.

Mr. HOBSON. I desire simply to ask this information of the gentleman, because I do not think he ought to impugn to our side any motive of playing politics in a serious investigation of crime and fraud against the Government, and if he has strictures to make on the resolution it is only right that he should specify the changes that would make it more perfect.

Mr. CANNON. I say again, for the first time I have read this resolution in the last 15 minutes. I have other duties to perform, and I must depend upon the various committees. I do not charge that side of the House with seeking to create headlines, whether they abound in fact or not, and should not have opened my mouth about this matter had not it been for the very interesting remarks of my colleague and very good friend from Georgia, who seemed to start out, and I take it he is to be the chairman of this committee, voicing in the beginning that we are going to raise the devil with an economic system under which the Republic has made its great progress for 50 years. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU].

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, the fears expressed by our distinguished friend from Illinois we believe to be entirely unfounded. This resolution, as has been stated, is unanimously reported by the Committee on Rules. Twenty-one years ago this antitrust law was enacted. Twenty years ago this corporation came into life. Since its formation it has grown and spread out in its operations, absorbing competitors, and there is a common belief existing among the people of the United States that it is every day violating the law. Now, the purpose of this inquiry is to ascertain whether or not that is true. There is no purpose to play politics. There is no desire to get flaming headlines in the newspapers, as suggested by the distinguished gentleman from Illinois, but the people of the United States are entitled to know why it is that this trust, if it be true that it is violating the law, is still doing business at the same old stand after an existence of 20 years. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, the resolution will have served its purpose if the investigation shall disclose, first, whether the American Sugar Refining Co. does exist in violation of law, and if so, why that company has not been prosecuted, convicted, and punished. That is the purpose of the resolution, it has no politics in it, and it comes in here with a unanimous report from the Committee on Rules.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from North Carolina yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. POU. I do.

Mr. MADDEN. The resolution does not provide, does it, for the committee to ascertain the cost of the production of sugar, the price at which it is sold to the jobber or the retailer or the consumer? It only goes to the question of ascertaining whether or not the Sugar Trust is violating the antitrust law. Is that not all this resolution provides?

Mr. POU. Oh, it does more than that. The gentleman can read for himself. There are quite a number of specifications. Now, there is a common belief that the Sugar Trust not only puts up the price of sugar to the consumer, but also puts down the price of sugar cane to the producer of cane; that it strikes at the producer of the products from which sugar is manufactured and also strikes at the cane grower.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman think the resolution is sufficiently broad to enable the committee to ascertain the facts which the gentleman thinks ought to come out from the statement made by him?

Mr. POU. Why, I most certainly do. If the gentleman will read the second paragraph, line 16, page 2, he will see that the committee is authorized to ascertain whether or not there has been an increase in price of refined sugar to the consumer or decrease in the price of sugar cane or sugar beets to the producer thereof, by reason of the formation of this company, its absorption of other companies engaged in the same business, and its relations with other companies which have not been actually taken over. There is no more important question before the people of the Nation to-day. It rises above politics—above both parties and all parties. No man can predict what the investigation will disclose, but there seems to be no division of opinion that it ought to be made.

Mr. MADDEN. As I read it, I conclude that it only refers to the question of a combination as between the so-called sugar refining company and the other companies that produce sugar, and whether a violation of the law by such combination increases the price. It does not authorize this committee to ascertain the cost of producing the sugar; it does not authorize the committee to ascertain what profits the sugar refining company makes, or anything of that sort, and that is what the people ought to know. That is what we are looking for.

Mr. KENDALL rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KENDALL]?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MADISON].

Mr. KENDALL. Will the gentleman from Texas yield to me before he yields to the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. MADISON. What is the question?

Mr. KENDALL. I want to inquire——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MADISON] yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KENDALL]?

Mr. MADISON. I do.

Mr. KENDALL. I submit an inquiry because I am entirely in sympathy with the investigation that is about to be ordered by this resolution. I want to ascertain from somebody who has given the subject more attention than I have been able to do, whether this committee will be empowered under this resolution to ascertain all the facts with reference to sugar production in this country and elsewhere; how much of it is under the control of the American Sugar Refining Co. and how much under the control of independent producers; and what proportion of the stock of independent companies is owned or controlled by the American Sugar Refining Co. All those facts, I think, ought to be developed for the benefit of the public.

Mr. MADISON. I will answer the gentleman as best I can, and I will answer him in the affirmative. I am satisfied the committee will have the authority to inquire as to the matters referred to by the gentleman, so far as this country is concerned.

But I want to say that I do not for one minute admit that the matters to which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] referred are covered by this resolution. As a member of the Committee on Rules who voted to report this resolution, I do not understand that it goes to the extent of authorizing the determining of the question of the wisdom or unwisdom of the maintenance of the present tariff duties on sugar; and I do not understand that that question is involved. So far as the economic policy is concerned as to maintaining a protective duty upon sugar, it is not included under this resolution, in my judgment. Now, then, the purpose of the resolution is stated in the first few lines. Let us read it together:

That a committee of nine Members is directed to make an investition—

For what purpose?

for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not there have been violations of the antitrust act.

That is the purpose of it. Now, if these other questions come in in any way, they come in in an incidental manner. But I think in determining whether or not there have been combinations in restraint of trade—and everybody understands that that is the gist of the antitrust act—that most of those questions which my friend from Iowa [Mr. KENDALL] referred to would, of necessity, be involved. But when you go into the broad field of the world's production of sugar, the cost of its production, the manner in which foreign countries deal with these questions, their export or import duties, and so forth, then I say that this resolution does not cover them.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the gentleman will yield just a moment——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MADISON] yield to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. MADISON. Certainly.

Mr. HARDWICK. The second specification, on the second page of the resolution, provides that one of the things that shall be investigated is an increase in the price of refined sugar. The gentleman will doubtless remember when this resolution was first introduced the comparison of prices with the prices in foreign countries was also provided for and that the change made was made on the theory that that was still included in the language as to increase of price.

Mr. MADISON. I probably will not be on this committee and be called on to construe the resolution, but I should say that the increase referred to as the resolution now reads is the increase to the American consumer, and that the decrease is that to the American consumer, and that it is not a question as to what prices or the cost of production may be in England or what prices or the cost of production may be in Germany. And if this committee takes upon itself the task of investigating those questions and reporting them to the House, in my judgment it will be clearly without its jurisdiction.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MADISON] yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. MADISON. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. If you leave out some of the immaterial part and insert this:

The committee shall also inquire whether the organization and operations of all other persons or corporations engaged in manufacturing or refining sugar have had a tendency to cause restriction or destruction of competition or increase the price.

Does not that include an investigation of everybody in the world engaged in either manufacturing or refining sugar?

Mr. MADISON. Oh, the gentleman is too good a lawyer to ask me that question.

Mr. MANN. I am good enough a lawyer to ask it.

Mr. MADISON. When you come to interpret a statute or resolution, the interpretation that is reasonable must be given as opposed to that which leads to an absurdity and which is ridiculous. It is not to be presumed for a moment that we are authorizing the investigation of corporations in England and in Germany.

Mr. MANN. Yes; you are authorizing the investigation of the entire subject.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, taking up the discussion where my friend from Kansas leaves it, I am compelled to differ from him somewhat as to his construction of the second specification in this resolution, namely, the increase in the price of refined sugar, and so forth. I think this committee will be authorized and empowered in the investigation it shall make to inquire into the prices of sugar in other countries for the purpose only of determining whether this combination, if it exists, has tended to increase the price of sugar in this country.

Suppose, Mr. Speaker, that this committee should find, or that the condition should be revealed, that these combinations controlled all the sugar in this country. Then, how would it be possible for this committee to ascertain whether they had increased the price of sugar in this country without making comparisons with the prices of sugar in other countries? It seems very plain to me that the committee is authorized to inquire into the prices in foreign countries for the purpose of ascertaining whether this combination has increased the price of sugar in this country.

One word more, Mr. Speaker. I am sorry that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] in his opening statement gave, as one of the purposes of this investigation, the ascertainment as to whether or not the protective-tariff system should be sustained, so far as sugar is concerned. I want to say, and the gentleman will bear me out in my statement, that in all the discussions before the committee on this question that was never suggested or considered by any member of the committee.

There were three propositions before the committee. It was held that it was proper to secure this information; first, so that if there were violations of law found the information secured by the committee might be an aid to the administrative arm of this Government in prosecuting them; second, if there was refusal to prosecute, it was within the province of the Congress to ascertain these facts, in order to deal with the question; and, third, if facts were ascertained showing that there were violations of the law and the present law that now exists on the statute books is not sufficient to cover the case fully, we ought to have this information in order that Congress might intelligently legislate further upon the subject.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman from Wisconsin has now in two minutes voiced what I tried to voice in reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK], and so tersely, that I wanted to indorse, although I could not incorporate in my remarks what the gentleman said. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Speaker, there are two provisions in the law relative to testimony before committees. One provides that no witness may decline to testify on the ground that the matter he will testify to will tend to disgrace him, or otherwise render him infamous, the other that the testimony of a witness shall not be used as evidence against him, except upon a prosecution for perjury committed in that testimony. That is as far as the present statutes go, so that the objection raised by the gentleman from Illinois is measurably well taken.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman refer to section 103 of the Revised Statutes in the statement which he made?

Mr. SAUNDERS. What does that section cover? I do not remember it by the number.

Mr. MANN. It provides that no witness who refuses to testify to a fact, and so forth——

Mr. SAUNDERS. I just referred to that.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we have conducted some very successful investigations under the laws as they are now found. We possess ample authority under existing laws to prosecute for a misdemeanor any witness who refuses to appear, and testify before a committee of this body. We possess ample authority to cause witnesses to appear before committees of this House, whether a full committee, or a subcommittee. It is true that we can not extend to witnesses, as the law stands, that complete immunity that we ought to be able to afford, in order to render our investigations completely effective, but these facts furnish no reason why the pending resolution should not be adopted by this body. During the progress of the work of the committee to be created it will be competent to introduce an amendment to the existing law, to provide that the witnesses hereafter examined shall have that immunity, which it is now insisted that we ought to give them. This may be hereafter done, but it is not necessary for the progress of this investigation to halt until the law can be amended. The progress of the investigation intended and the amendment of existing law can go hand in hand.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BURLESON). Does the gentleman from Virginia yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. SAUNDERS. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. COOPER. I should like to get the gentleman's idea as to the propriety of leaving this resolution in its present form, so that the full committee or a subcommittee investigating this exceedingly important subject may, in its discretion, hold its meetings in secret. There is no provision in this rule, but there ought to be a provision in every rule of this kind requiring the meetings of the committee and of every subcommittee to be public. People want to know what is brought out at these investigations. Why was not such a provision for publicity incorporated in this resolution as was contained in the resolution providing for the Ballinger-Pinchot investigation?

Mr. SAUNDERS. I will say in response to the gentleman's query that it relates to a question of policy. So far as I am concerned, I would make it imperative, in every resolution of this character, that all of its hearings shall be conducted in public.

Mr. COOPER. Yes. In the Ballinger-Pinchot investigation, an exceedingly important proceeding, the House, with practical unanimity, adopted an amendment requiring not only the main committee but any subcommittee to hold its meetings in public.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I am not in charge of this resolution, and therefore can not say why the provision referred to in the gentleman's question, is not included in its contents.

Mr. HARDWICK. I will say to the gentleman from Wisconsin that it is the purpose of the committee to have its hearings in public; but certainly at the executive sessions of the committee the people who are being investigated should not be taken into the confidence of the committee in its deliberations.

Mr. COOPER. The gentleman knows how such a requirement for publicity has been construed in practice. The Ballinger-Pinchot committee, either the main committee or any subcommittee, were required to hold their meeting in public, but that requirement was construed to permit the committee or any subcommittee to hold merely its executive sessions in secret, but all the taking of testimony was in public.

Mr. HARDWICK. That ought to be public, and it will be, of course.

Mr. COOPER. But it ought not to be left to the discretion of any committee to make it secret.

Mr. MADDEN. Introduce an amendment.

Mr. COOPER. I will introduce an amendment at the proper time.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I will say further in response to the question of the gentleman from Wisconsin, that I am the author of a resolution of a character similar to this, and that resolution expressly provides that all sessions of the committee therein created, shall be public.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have discussed the legal phases only of this question, in reply to the suggestion of the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. What he says is true, but we can not go further, than the law allows. We can not give the committee, by a resolution of this House alone, any other power than it is now given by existing law. We will have to do one of two things. We will have to proceed with this investigation under the law as it now stands, and seek to amend the existing law so as to give that larger power of immunity which ought to be given, or else we will have to transform this resolution into a joint resolution, and thus give the committee the power to which the gentleman refers, and which properly should be given to all investigating committees. There is no necessary reason however why we should halt this investigation to do either one of these things, because we have conducted, as recently as within the last 12 months, a very successful inquiry under the power which the House enjoys under the law as it now stands.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, the resolution seems to be broad enough to cover every phase intended to be reached by Congress, and I think is drawn with sufficient wisdom and efficiency to meet the emergencies confronting us. The Committee on Rules proceeded with deliberation and were exceedingly careful in drafting the resolution. I believe it is appropriate in phraseology and intent. And now, inasmuch as no one else seems to care to discuss the resolution, I call for the previous question.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman permit an inquiry?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Yes.

Mr. COOPER. Does the gentleman intend by that to preclude the possibility of amendments?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Yes; I think it is sufficient as it stands. I call for the previous question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on ordering the previous question.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. COOPER) there were—ayes 92, noes 28.

So the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. HENRY of Texas, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ABOLISHING CERTAIN HOUSE OFFICES.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I submit the following privileged resolution from the Committee on Accounts, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 128 (H. Rept. 25).

Resolved, That the following offices and employments in the service of the House of Representatives, the salaries of which as hereinafter set forth are provided in the act "making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1911, and for other purposes," approved June 17, 1910, and the act "making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1912, and for other purposes," approved March 4, 1911, be, and the same shall become and are hereby, declared to be vacant on and after May 15, 1911, and the said enumerated offices are hereby abolished as offices of the House of Representatives, namely:

Stenographers to committees: Assistant, $2,000; janitor, $720.

Janitor for rooms of official reporters of debates, $800.

Office of Sergeant at Arms: Clerk in charge of pairs, $1,800; assistant bookkeeper, $1,200.

Police force, House Office Building: Captain, $1,600; 1 lieutenant, $1,200; 5 privates, $1,050 each.

Office of Doorkeeper: Clerk to Doorkeeper, $1,200; Assistant Doorkeeper, $2,500; 2 attendants in the old library space, $1,500 each; chief clerk, $2,000; 1 clerk, $1,600; assistant foreman, $1,200; second assistant foreman, $1,200; 2 night watchmen, $720 each; 9 messengers, $1,180 each; 6 laborers, $720 each; skilled laborer, $820; 1 laborer in the water-closet, $840.

Resolved, That there shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, until otherwise provided for by law, compensation at the rates hereinafter set forth for the purposes indicated, namely:

For services in the office of the Clerk: One chief bill clerk, at $3,000 per annum; 4 assistants, at $1,500 per annum each; and 1 stenographer, at $1,000 per annum, who shall be in lieu of and shall perform on and after May 15, 1911, under such regulations as the Clerk may prescribe, all of the duties heretofore performed by the clerks whose offices shall become vacant on and after said date.

Resolved, That all unbound documents and reports hereafter printed for the Clerk's office, under authority of section 54 of the printing and binding act, approved January 12, 1895, and testimony in contested-election cases, together with all documents and reports now in the Clerk's document room, shall be delivered to the superintendent of the House document room, who shall keep a separate file thereof and distribute the same only upon the written order of the Clerk; the Manual and Digest of the Rules and Practice of the House of Representatives, ordered printed and bound by House resolution adopted April 11, 1911, shall be folded and distributed from the folding room to Members, Delegates, and Resident Commissioners under the provisions of the printing and binding act approved January 12, 1895; and orders for binding documents, pursuant to section 99 of said printing and binding act, shall be filed in the House document room, and the duty of keeping an account thereof by the Clerk, as required by said section, shall be performed, in addition to his regular duties, by a clerk detailed from the Clerk's office without extra compensation.

Resolved, That the distribution of packing boxes for the shipment of frankable matter shall be made under such regulations as the Clerk may prescribe: Provided, That each Member, Delegate, and Resident Commissioner shall be entitled to the same number and kind of boxes as heretofore allowed.

Mr. LLOYD and Mr. BARTLETT rose.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the point of order on that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois reserves the point of order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman a question in regard to that. As I understand from information, this resolution is to carry out the directions of the Democratic caucus?

Mr. LLOYD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. To dispense with certain offices in the House?

Mr. LLOYD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Well, Mr. Speaker, while I think the resolution is clearly not privileged, so far as I am concerned I have no objection to considering it in the House at any time. I withdraw the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is withdrawn.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia reserves the point of order.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to reserve it with the distinct statement that I am not going to press it. I understand what this resolution is and shall not oppose it, but I do not think that this resolution ought to be permitted to occupy the position of a privileged resolution under the rules. The rules prescribe what are privileged resolutions from this committee. That portion of the resolution which provides for the payment of money out of the contingent fund is the only part of it that is privileged, and the nonprivileged portions destroy its privilege. The other parts of the resolution, providing for the abolition of certain offices, naming them, and those portions providing for the disposition of unbound documents and reports, and the printing and binding of contested-election cases and other documents, and the balance of the resolution, are not privileged. I am perfectly willing that the House should consider this resolution as the House may desire to do, but I do not think that this ought to be accepted as a precedent for admitting resolutions which are not privileged to take the character of privileged. The gentleman from Missouri offers it as a privileged resolution.

The Chair on another occasion ruled that because Members of Congress had remained silent in their seats and had not made points of order against resolutions that ought to be, and under the rules were required to be, considered in Committee of the Whole, a point of order would not lie; and in order that all of us may not be bound by remaining silent, I have reserved the point of order for the purpose of calling the attention of the Chair and the House to the character of this resolution, that is not in its nature a privileged resolution under the rules, that this may not hereafter be invoked as a precedent upon Members to bind them simply because they remained silent, and that the rule may not be abolished by Members simply remaining silent or acquiescing in what is an evident violation of the rules. I do not desire to make the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman does not make the point of order?

Mr. BARTLETT. No.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this resolution is to carry out the action of the Democratic caucus. At the Democratic caucus it was decided that certain offices about this Capitol are unnecessary and ought to be abolished. This resolution carries out, without change of any kind, the suggestions that were made by that caucus. I now yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. FLOYD].

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this resolution is to carry out the objects and purposes of a resolution adopted by the Democratic caucus for the abolishment of certain offices that were deemed useless. Resolution 128 refers to offices that are exclusively within the control of the House. Another resolution has been reported by your committee, joint resolution No. 75, which deals with the Capitol police force. In the caucus resolution it was recommended that 34 privates of the Capitol police force be dismissed. The Capitol police force is provided for in the current appropriation bills, and it is provided therein that one-half of them shall be named by the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate and one-half of them named by the Sergeant at Arms of the House.

That being the case, not desiring to reduce the entire force of the Capitol police of the House, we introduced House joint resolution No. 75, which relates to the Capitol police force. The other offices recommended to be abolished by the Democratic caucus are included in House resolution No. 128, now under consideration. When this resolution was referred to your committee we went into a further investigation to ascertain whether or not we could abolish the offices designated without detriment to the service, and also as to the power of the House to deal with those offices independently of the action of the Senate. In the Constitution, Article I, section 2, paragraph 5, it is declared:

The House of Representatives shall choose their Speaker and other officers.

Article I, section 5, paragraph 2 of the Constitution declares:

Each House may determine the rules of its proceedings.

By an examination of the precedents, we find them uniform for about 30 years to the effect that the House, under its constitutional authority, has the right to create its offices, vacate, and abolish them, and that in the exercise of such power it may abolish offices created by an act of Congress——

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Arkansas yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Certainly; for a question.

Mr. MANN. Agreeing with the gentleman as to our authority to abolish offices, I understood the gentleman to say we had the authority to create offices ourselves, regardless of appropriations. Is that the gentleman's belief, that either House of Congress can create offices ad libitum without the consent of the other body?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Only the offices within its peculiar and exclusive jurisdiction.

Mr. MANN. Well, I know——

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. That is, offices of the House.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman think the Senate of the United States has authority to add all the officers it may please without regard to the action of the House? It will be very valuable to the Senate if——

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I take the position that, as a matter of constitutional authority this House has the right to create such offices as it deems proper independent of the Senate and to abolish them at will independent of the Senate or independent of any act or resolution of a former Congress creating them or independent of any law that may have been passed through the two Houses and signed by the President. That is, these offices within the House, not offices outside.

Mr. MANN. This House has no greater authority as to House offices than the Senate has as to Senate offices.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Certainly not; I agree with the gentleman as to that, but I take the position that the Senate has the same absolute power over its officers that we have in the House.

Mr. MANN. I am sorry to hear the gentleman give expression to that opinion, which I do not think is well founded, but if it were well founded—well, I am not going to say, because we have to deal with the Senate in a proper and parliamentary way——

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I yielded for a question, and I do not want the gentleman to take up so much of my time.

Mr. MANN. We have all day before us.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. My time is limited to 20 minutes.

Mr. MANN. We will get you some more.

Mr. LLOYD. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Arkansas yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. LLOYD. The gentleman has reference to the life of the present Congress, has he not——

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. LLOYD. When the gentleman says that we have the right to control offices and abolish any we desire?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. The gentleman from Illinois will understand before I get through that my statement refers to the powers of the present Congress, and I am coming to that later. It is held repeatedly in the precedents, and they are uniform, that no preceding Congress has the right or power to bind a future Congress by resolution or by an act of Congress, and it therefore follows where authority is vested in either body by the Constitution as when it says each House, it means either House independent of the other body, independent of the action of the other body, and clearly gives each House absolute control over the creation of its officers, and it necessarily follows it has the same power to destroy that it has to create. The Constitution gives the House absolute power over the rules and proceedings of the body, and it gives the House power to modify those rules from time to time.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. I quite agree with the gentleman that under the Constitution the House may choose its help or its officers. But how are they to be paid? I take it that they are to be paid from the contingent fund, as this provides?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Certainly. The gentleman is correct as to that proposition.

Mr. CANNON. Is it not true that the House can not appropriate by itself for a contingent fund?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. So that, after all, fortunately, not so far as the House is concerned, but so far as another body is concerned, I am very glad that the House, as well as the Senate, must agree to the appropriation, and then that it shall be approved by the President. And then, if I do not worry the gentleman, just for a minute I want to make a little statement along that line.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. My time is limited, but I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LLOYD. I will extend the time of the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. CANNON. Now, to illustrate: When I last inquired, the Senate, consisting of a body probably of 92 Members, had three or four times as much expense in running that body as the House had, and that was before this proposed action. And I want in that same line to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that the Senate by a resolution under the law, as it existed, namely, that expenditures from the contingent fund should be paid on the certificate of the Secretary, created the Capitol Commission, which traveled all over Europe and spent $75,000 without any authority of law except that resolution. They exhausted the contingent fund and made a deficiency in the appropriation to carry on the business of the Senate, and when the appropriation to supply that deficiency came up this House would not assent to it until the Senate assented to an amendment to the law to the effect that the expenditures of both the House and the Senate should be audited by the Treasury Department. So that, if we exhaust this contingent fund, the employees that we create, as we have the power to do, must depend for their pay upon an appropriation in which the Senate and the President would participate.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, I quite agree with the distinguished gentleman from Illinois upon that proposition, but he fails to see or to understand the real purpose of this resolution. We only create officers under the resolution whose salaries in the aggregate amount to $10,000. We propose to abolish officers whose combined salaries amount to something like $180,000. I wish to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the Senate has no control whatever over the question of abolishing these House officers. The money is already appropriated for them in the current appropriations, it is true; but if the places are abolished it will lapse into the Treasury, and the difficulty suggested by the gentleman from Illinois, to my mind, is one of small consideration in view of the general purposes of the resolution.

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman will allow me, I am not opposing the resolution. I am quite content that the majority, in its wisdom, shall fill offices that are authorized by law; and yet, if the gentleman will allow me, I expect in the future life of the Sixty-second Congress, in large part, to see in resolutions reported by my genial friend, the chairman of the Committee on Accounts, necessary employees picked up galore.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, I desire now to go into the merits of the proposition.

We are acting in response to a caucus resolution. The Committee on Accounts investigated, or made a further investigation, of the question, and we came to the conclusion—the Democratic members of that committee—that we could abolish these offices and make the several changes proposed without detriment to the service. And I think the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], unless in some way the present Committee on Accounts is changed, will not see these officers reinstated from time to time. In all frankness, it may be that it will be necessary for the Committee on Accounts to restore or recreate some of these offices or to establish or to create new offices in the future. I would not say to the contrary. The exigencies of the occasion might require it.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, is it not also possible, but probable, that the Committee on Accounts will have occasion to discontinue other useless offices that have been carried on the rolls for the last few years?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I think so. I want to make my statement, and when I am through I will be very glad to further yield to gentlemen, if I have any time.

Mr. OLMSTED. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Arkansas yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. For just a moment.

Mr. OLMSTED. I understood you to say that by this resolution you abolished offices to the amount of $180,000? I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that on page 4 of the RECORD——

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I should have said that this resolution and joint resolution 75 abolishes offices to the amount of about $119,000.

Mr. OLMSTED (continuing). That the net saving under this resolution is stated to be $182,000

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Approximately so, under the caucus resolution, but I hope the gentleman will not take up any more of my time on that proposition. I decline to yield further for the present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas declines to yield.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I decline to yield further for the present, Mr. Speaker, because I want to explain this resolution.

Now, we made an investigation; we appointed subcommittees to confer with the Speaker, with the Sergeant at Arms, with the Clerk, and with the Doorkeeper in regard to these officers that are proposed to be abolished, and as to the great bulk of them we found no protest whatsoever against their abolition. Those officials agreed that they ought to be abolished. We were informed by some of the new officers of the House, elected since the opening of Congress, that they could not find or locate some of these employees, and yet they are on the rolls drawing their pay. They could not locate them. They do not know where they are and never saw them.

Now, to give you an example of the necessity of this resolution, I want to take up just one illustration as a sample of how offices have been duplicated and multiplied unnecessarily, and that relates to the Journal clerk's office and the bill clerk's office and the various other clerks in that department. I just want to call your attention to them. Here they are: Journal clerk, $4,000; assistant Journal clerk, $2,200; index clerk, $2,500; assistant index clerk, $1,700; stenographer to the Journal clerk, $980; janitor for index room, $840; janitor to Journal clerk, $720; printing and bill clerk, $2,700; assistant printing and bill clerk, $1,800; notification clerk, $2,300; distributing clerk, $2,250; document and bill clerk, $2,100; resolution and petition clerk, $2,000; printing and document clerk, $2,000. It is difficult to see how they could get up so many variations on the word "clerk" in this department. There are 14 different officers in this division of the Clerk's office alone, aggregating in salaries $28,900.

Now, what do they do? They take care of the Journal and the bills. We propose to abolish them all except the Journal clerk, at $4,000, and create a chief bill clerk, at $3,000, and four assistants, at $6,000; one stenographer, at $1,000; making seven in all, whose aggregate salaries will be $14,000, instead of $28,900, thus saving more than one-half the amount now paid for this particular service.

Now, the Committee on Accounts was not able to bring in this action without protest and objection. It was insisted that an index clerk for the Journal was absolutely essential. It was insisted that we had to have the index clerk. Under the existing law there is an index clerk and an assistant index clerk. The index clerk receives $2,500 and the assistant index clerk receives $1,700. But we have got a law on the subject of indexing. In the printing and binding act, which was approved January 12, 1895, and has not been amended or repealed expressly, we have this provision—section 14:

> The Joint Committee on Printing shall designate to the Public Printer a competent person to prepare the semimonthly and session index to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and shall fix and regulate the compensation to be paid by the Public Printer for said work and direct the form and manner of its publication and distribution.

That index is made at the office of the Public Printer. Now, the Journal must be kept by the Journal clerk. It must be printed, and the rules of the House require that it shall be properly indexed. But it is clearly apparent that if the men who index the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD index it properly and correctly the Journal clerk's work in indexing the Journal is very simple, because the index to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD must contain everything that is provided for in the Journal kept by the Journal clerk. There must be a note made of every motion, bill, or resolution considered, proceeding had, or order made, and of all amendments thereto. If the index to the RECORD is properly kept—and I take it for granted that it is—the Journal clerk can very easily make a correct and accurate index of the Journal therefrom. Under the new arrangement of officers the men in the Journal clerk's office, the chief bill clerk, and his four assistants will be busy men during the sessions of Congress. They have an enormous amount of work to do when the House is in session. There can be no doubt of that. But at the close of the session, after the adjournment of Congress, they are not so crowded with work, and under the rearrangement of these offices the Journal clerk, with the aid of the bill clerk and his four assistants, can certainly, with the aid of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD index, made at the office of the Public Printer, prepare without difficulty or undue delay an accurate and complete index to the Journal.

Mr. WATKINS. Does the gentleman understand that the work of this index clerk is indispensable to the getting out of the index which is carried with the temporary issues of the RECORD during the session of Congress?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I have just read the law, which makes it the duty of the Committee on Printing to designate to the Public Printer a competent person for that purpose, and to keep up that index. I am insisting that the law as it is written shall be enforced, and that we should not have the additional help of an index clerk at $2,500 a year, and an assistant index clerk at $1,700 a year, to do what the law enjoins upon the Public Printer to do.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LLOYD. I yield 10 minutes more to the gentleman on account of the interruptions to which he has been subjected.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas is recognized for 10 minutes more.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I hope the gentleman will not interrupt me at this stage; but I will yield for one question. I have some other matters I want to discuss.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is undertaking to explain his resolution. I think he ought to be willing to submit to interruptions.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I say I am willing.

Mr. MANN. I want to ask about the index clerk that the gentleman has just referred to. Does the gentleman think it is the duty of the Printing Office to make up the index of the RECORD which we receive?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. That is what the law says. Section 14 of the printing act so provides. I understand that the index to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD which we receive is made at the Printing Office.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman think there would be any economy effected by having the Printing Office do it, where it may not be properly done, instead of having it done under the control of the Journal clerk?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I do not think there would be any economy in duplicating the work, but this resolution proposes to cut out the index clerk and let the man designated to the Public Printer by the Committee on Printing do it, as prescribed by the printing act, which has not been repealed, and is now in force; and my information is, as already stated, that they now index the RECORD.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is mistaken. They do not do it. The index of the RECORD is made down here in a room by two clerks, both of whom are busily engaged.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I have been down there. They use the RECORD index in preparing the index for the Journal.

Mr. GARNER. Does the gentleman speak from experience?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I decline to yield further at this time, because I want to discuss another matter.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman declines to give information.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. The gentleman from Illinois may put it that way, if he desires, but I want to discuss some other matters. If I have the time, I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois later.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman is not willing to answer questions when he is in charge of this matter, he will have to have a quorum present to proceed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois is not in order.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman in charge of a bill ought to be willing to give information concerning it.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I yield to the gentleman for a question for information.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman just stated that he would not yield and cut off the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER]. I have no question to ask now, but I think we are entitled to that consideration from the gentleman.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. If the gentleman has no question I will proceed.

Now, there is another matter which this resolution proposes to change, and that is in regard to the Clerk's document room. The printing act which I have referred to, section 60, approved January 12, 1895, in effect abolished the Clerk's document room and provided for the transfer of the documents kept in that room to the House document room, under the control and custody of the Doorkeeper.

There is a clause in the act providing that this provision shall not take effect until the first day of the next session of Congress, and when the first day of the next session of Congress arrived a special employee, by a simple resolution of the House, was appointed to take charge of these documents. A little later on there was appointed a document clerk, and a little later there was appointed a superintendent of documents in the Clerk's document room and then an assistant, and it has been running in that way without any legal status of existence since 1895. One of these employees received a salary of $1,900 per annum, another $1,800, another $1,585, and another $980.

This resolution intends to carry into effect the provisions of the printing act referred to, which, after an exhaustive examination and report, was passed by the Congress, and has never been carried into effect. Now, the Clerk's document room, as at present administered, deals with only three propositions, and I will mention those of least importance first. Through it are distributed the congressional boxes, three in number, delivered to each Member of Congress, for frankable matter. The Clerk has a manual of the rules of the House printed, and this has been distributed through the Clerk's document room. This resolution provides that hereafter the manual of the rules, when printed, shall be delivered to the folding room, to the credit of the individual Member, and be allotted to the Members as other public documents, which, I think, is a much better system than the one in use at present. The only other function of the Clerk's document room is that of looking after orders and requisitions for binding documents for Members. We provide in this resolution that the custody of such documents shall go into the hands of the Doorkeeper, and be kept in the House document room, and that the Doorkeeper shall keep a separate file of all documents delivered to the Clerk under the different provisions of the law, and that they shall be distributed only upon the requisition of the Clerk himself, and that the Clerk shall detail from his force some one to keep a record of the requisitions and orders of Members of Congress for the binding of public documents.

We did not abolish the Clerk's document room because it has been abolished for all these years. We simply provide a means whereby the purpose of the Congress when it adopted the provision referred to in the printing act, which has not in any way been repealed, may be carried into effect. We do not see the necessity for having two document rooms, one under the Clerk and the other under the Doorkeeper, so we transfer these documents to the custody of one man, the Doorkeeper, who has charge of the House document room, and provide that the Clerk, without extra pay, shall designate some member of his force to take care of orders for binding documents and keep a record thereof.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to explain the statement to which my attention was called by the gentleman from Pennsylvania a few moments ago. I want to state briefly what is proposed in this caucus resolution, and I will ask to publish the caucus resolution as an appendix to my remarks. This resolution follows literally all the recommendations of the caucus resolution. In the first place by its provisions we abolish under the Speaker 3 places, under the Clerk 32, under the Sergeant at Arms, including the House Office police, 9, under the Doorkeeper 27. That makes 71 that this resolution proposes to abolish. Now, the joint resolution 75 provides for the abolishment of 35 of the Capitol police force, and that would make 106 all told, if both of these resolutions should pass, that would be abolished.

Under the caucus resolution it is provided that hereafter the extra month's pay shall not be paid to the officers and employees of the House. We are not criticizing anybody for that practice. We know it was popular with the officers, but we do not think it is right or proper nor a fair way to do. If their salaries ought to be increased, we believe that the Congress of the United States ought to assume the responsibility for raising them, and let it go to the country as their true salaries. So we have declared as a party against the policy of this extra month's pay, and it is not necessary for the Committee on Accounts to take any further step in that direction, except to observe our determination to refuse it when the time comes. The Democratic House proposes to decline to vote away the people's money as a gratuity to Government officials.

When we adopted the rules we abolished a number of committees of the House that we deemed useless and unnecessary. The saving, accurately figured, on this item is somewhat less than was reported in the caucus resolution. It is estimated in the caucus resolution at $10,000, but the actual saving by reason of the abolishment of six committees in the committee report accompanying this resolution is $5,709.

Resolution 128, now under consideration, provides for the abolishment of offices, to take effect on the 15th of May, whose aggregate salaries as carried to-day on the pay roll are $92,010. Deduct from this amount the salaries of new offices created in this resolution, $10,000, and it leaves a net saving under this resolution of $82,010. Add to this the salaries of the Capitol police force proposed to be dispensed with by House joint resolution 75, which would be $36,900. Average amount saved per session by abolishing six committees, $5,709, and an amount equal to one month's extra pay to officers and employees of the House, the practice of granting which is to be discontinued (estimated), $65,000 (the amount for second session Sixty-first Congress was $65,303.78), less one-twelfth of salaries discontinued, $10,742.50, which would leave a net saving for discontinuing that practice of $54,257.50, or a grand total, when all these recommendations are carried into effect, of $179,294.50.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD and print in connection with them the report and also the resolution adopted by the Democratic caucus.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, which of course I do not intend to do, the gentleman stated he intends to publish the caucus resolution as a part of his remarks.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. As an addendum to my remarks.

Mr. MANN. Does he intend to put in the entire resolution?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Yes; the entire resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The report is as follows:

[H. Rept. No. 25, 62d Cong., 1st sess.]

CERTAIN OFFICES IN THE SERVICE OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES TO BE DECLARED VACANT AND ABOLISHED.

The Committee on Accounts, to whom was referred House resolution 128, declaring vacant certain offices in the service of the House of Representatives, and for other purposes, have considered the same and recommend its adoption with the following amendments:

Page 2, line 2, strike out "first" and insert "fifteenth."

Page 2, line 2, after the word "eleven," insert "and the said enumerated offices are hereby abolished as offices of the House of Representatives."

This resolution is in conformity with and carries out the mandate of the Democratic Party expressed at a caucus of a majority of the Representatives elected to the Sixty-second Congress, held on April 1, 1911, in so far as a simple resolution of the House can do so. It is also the purpose of the Committee on Accounts, pursuant to the Democratic caucus action on said date, to recommend the passage of a joint resolution reducing the Capitol police force, the concurrence of the Senate being necessary to effect this reform, inasmuch as members of the Capitol police force are appointed under the law one-half by the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate and one-half by the Sergeant at Arms of the House.

These several propositions, if adopted, will effect economy and retrenchment in the service of the House of Representatives by the abolition, practically, of offices deemed useless, thereby saving $128,910 per year. And having thus set its own house in order, a majority of the people's Representatives charged with the conduct of the business of the House of Representatives as now organized can and will with good grace, in good faith, and consistently proceed earnestly and vigorously to prosecute investigations of every branch of the Government service, under authority of a resolution already adopted by the House, with a view to the abolition of useless offices, and to effect reforms and greater economy in the expenditure of vast sums of the people's money. The comparatively small saving effected in the House itself is an index of what may be accomplished in the wider field of governmental activities, and an earnest of the purpose of the dominant party in the House to fulfill its promise of economy, consistent with good service, made to the people last year.

Returning to a discussion of the Democratic caucus action, the Committee on Accounts calls attention to the fact that already that part of the caucus mandate for the abolition of six useless committees of the House has been carried out in the new rules by the omission of the following committees, namely: Pacific Railroads, Manufactures, Militia, Private Land Claims, Levees and Improvements of the Mississippi River, Ventilation and Acoustics.

Each of these committees in the last Congress, excepting Ventilation and Acoustics, had a session clerk at $6 per day, and the Committees on Pacific Railroads, Manufactures, and Levees and Improvements of the Mississippi River had the services in part of messenger-janitors at $60 per month; and each committee had a room which has been assigned in this Congress for the use of working committees. The saving thus effected is not alone in actual money, but in much-needed space as well. Taking the figures of the long and short sessions of the Sixty-first Congress and adding them together to get the average expenditure per year for clerical and messenger-janitor service for the committees named, exclusive of Ventilation and Acoustics, it appears that the saving is $11,418, divided thus: Five clerks, at $6 per day, long session, 6 months 27 days, $6,180; short session, 3 months 25 days, $3,510; 3 messenger-janitors, long session, $1,194; short session, $534; total, $11,418.

This resolution makes vacant on and after May 15, 1911, and abolishes offices and employments in the service of the House of Representatives the titles and salaries of which are as follows:

Under the Speaker.
Assistant stenographer to committees	$2,000

Under the Speaker	$3,250.00
Clerk's office	46,970.00
Sergeant at Arms' office, including House Office Building	11,050.00
Doorkeeper's office	30,740.00
		92,010.00
Deduct salaries of new offices created in Clerk's office, five in number		10,000.00
Net saving under this resolution		82,010.00
To which add salaries of Capitol police proposed to be dispensed with by House joint resolution 75		36,900.00
Average amount saved per session by abolishing six committees		5,709.00
And an amount equal to one month's extra pay to officers and employees of the House, the practice of granting which is to be discontinued (estimated), $65,000 (the amount for 2d sess. 61st Cong. was $65,303.78), less one-twelfth of salaries discontinued ($10,742.50)		54,257.50
Grand total saved under House resolution 128, House joint resolution 75, and by discontinuance of extra month's pay, pursuant to Democratic caucus action		179,294.50

The provision in the accompanying resolution for one chief bill clerk, at $3,000 per annum, four assistants, at $1,500 per annum each, and one stenographer, at $1,000 per annum, in the Clerk's office is made necessary because of the discontinuance of certain clerks whose duties are to be consolidated and hereafter performed by the chief bill clerk and his assistants. This arrangement, it is believed, will result in efficient service by the application of more modern methods than at present used. The printing and bill clerk and his assistant, the notification clerk, the distributing clerk, the document and bill clerk, the resolution and petition clerk, and the printing and document clerk receive and prepare for printing, keep records of, notify Members and committees of the status of, make transcripts of, and distribute all legislative propositions, such as bills, joint resolutions, simple and concurrent resolutions, executive and miscellaneous documents, reports, petitions, memorials, etc. This work will be brought under one head (the chief bill clerk), greatly simplified, and much duplication and unnecessary work eliminated.

The methods in vogue in connection with some of this work are cumbersome and primitive. In large, unwieldy books is kept the parliamentary history of each proposition, bill, resolution, etc. This system is about 50 years old. There is no general index, and dependence must largely be placed in the semimonthly index of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. A card system would serve both the purpose of identifying a particular measure and showing its status. The system introduced and operated by the notification clerk during the last three Congresses has served well the purpose of keeping Members and committees advised of every stage in the progress of a bill after it has been reported from a committee, and also as a current and permanent index and record. With its enlargement so as to embrace a few other necessary features, the consolidation of all of the offices mentioned may readily be made and the work carried on with equal dispatch and efficiency. The clerical force remaining at the disposal of the Clerk, together with the proposed chief bill clerk and his four assistants, will be ample, in the judgment of your committee, for the proper transaction of the business in question.

Providing the chief bill clerk with four assistants without designating titles to indicate the character of the duties to be performed by them leaves discretionary with the Clerk of the House their assignment to any necessary duty. And we think that if this practice obtained throughout the entire service of the House the work of the various departments would be more evenly distributed among the clerks at less expense, and the multiplication of new offices when new duties arise avoided to some extent. The giving of titles to offices has served to fasten such offices on the permanent rolls, however temporary may have been the object which called them into being, and to confine the occupants to the specified work indicated by the title no matter how great the exigency that made necessary the services of such clerk. These conditions and the law forbidding transfers are responsible and have furnished the reasons or excuse in the past for creating new offices to meet each new requirement, notwithstanding the fact that a number of well-paid clerks with titles are or should be available for every exigency. The law referred to is as follows:

"Hereafter employees of the House of Representatives under the Clerk, Sergeant at Arms, Doorkeeper, and Postmaster shall only be assigned to and engaged upon the duties of the positions to which they are appointed and for which compensation is provided, except in cases of emergency or congestion of public business incident to the close of a session of Congress or other like cause an employee or employees may be assigned or required to aid in the discharge of the duties of any other employee or employees, and in the discretion of the Doorkeeper not more than one folder may, if necessary, be assigned to do clerical work under the direction of the foreman of the folding room, but all assignments made hereunder shall be without additional compensation and shall not constitute the basis of a claim therefor." (From the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act of Mar. 3, 1901, Supp. R. S., vol. 2, p. 1530.)

This provision was, in part, the result of the so-called Moody investigation, and effectually stopped a practice of transfers and the payment of extra compensation; but it has also resulted, as before stated, in preventing the use of employees for new duties and in the creation of new offices. As illustrating the extent to which the practice of giving titles to offices has gone, it is only necessary to mention those of printing and bill clerk, assistant printing and bill clerk, document and bill clerk, printing and document clerk, document clerk, each and all of whom have like and similar duties, and who could as well have been designated by the generic term "clerk" or "assistant" and assigned to any necessary duty. This plan if generally adopted would, of course, require classification of salaries, which is not our present purpose. The principle involved is carried out in our recommendation of "four assistants" to the chief bill clerk.

The stenographer provided for at $1,000 per annum is to be in lieu of the assistant Journal clerk, at $2,200, and the stenographer to the Journal clerk, at $980, as it is believed that the Journal clerk will be amply provided with assistance with the use of a stenographer.

The Committee on Accounts was designated by the Democratic caucus of April 1, 1911, as the committee properly to make recommendations to the House carrying out the wishes of the caucus. And the Committee on Accounts has carefully considered various methods of procedure, concluding that the present House of Representatives has constitutional power at will to dispense with offices in its own service and to create other offices it may deem necessary by simple resolution of the House regardless of what the House in a previous Congress may have provided for its own service either by statute or resolution. Therefore we recommend the adoption of a simple resolution declaring certain offices vacant on and after May 15, 1911, and another resolution substituting therefor certain new offices, fewer in number. The effect of the adoption of this resolution will be to separate on said date from the service of the House the present incumbents of the offices made vacant and to abolish such offices.

The salaries already appropriated for such offices for the balance of this fiscal year, ending June 30, 1911, and for the entire fiscal year ending June 30, 1912, will be covered back into the Treasury; in fact, they will not be withdrawn from the Treasury, for the Clerk of the House, in executing the resolution, will not make requisition on the Secretary of the Treasury, and consequently no warrant will issue. The Clerk's annual report of expenditures will show unexpended balances for the remainder of the present and for the whole of the next fiscal year under the heading "Salaries, officers and employees." Then, at the ensuing regular session, when the legislative appropriation bill is formulated for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, the salaries of the offices now made vacant will be, in accordance with this resolution, omitted altogether from the bill. This method your committee recommends. It is direct, and admits of no delay in its execution. Then, if thought necessary or advisable, the House may follow up this action and leisurely pass a joint resolution repealing the provisions of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation acts of June 17, 1910, and March 4, 1911, making appropriations for the specific offices in question. This course was suggested instead of that we recommend as being the only legal method whereby the House may act in the matter. But we are convinced that it is perfectly competent for the House to follow the method first outlined. Moreover, concurrence of the Senate and the approval of the President is necessary for the passage of a joint resolution, and that body may not act at once, if it acts at all.

It is inconceivable that the House can not independently of both the Senate and President regulate its internal affairs to the extent of abolishing and creating its own officers and employees. Because a former House chose to maintain and appropriate for certain offices in the service of the House is no good reason why this present House should be bound by that action, any more than that the rules of the last Congress are or should be the rules of this Congress. Under the Constitution each House may determine the rules of its proceedings. (Art. I, sec. 5, par. 2.)

The Constitution (Art. I, sec. 2, par. 5) also declares: "The House of Representatives shall choose their Speaker and other officers."

The rule of the House (Rule II) provides that each officer elected by the House "shall appoint all of the employees of his department provided for by law." Judge William Lawrence, for many years Comptroller of the Treasury, and a Member of this House, whose legal learning and experience made him an authority on questions of constitutional and parliamentary law, in commenting on this rule (which has been the rule for many years), said:

"It is well settled that when authority is granted to a designated officer to appoint any person in his discretion to an office, and the law does not give the incumbent a right to hold the same for any specified period, the power of removal and of filling the vacancy thereby made is incidental to the authority to appoint." (Judge Lawrence cited 2 Story Const., 4th ed., par. 1537. First Comptroller's Decisions, Vol. V, p. 4.)

We believe that according to this principle it would be entirely within their power for the Speaker, the Clerk, the Sergeant at Arms, and the Doorkeeper to remove from office the incumbents of the offices now in question, and to refrain from appointing their successors. The object sought could thus be accomplished in a very simple way. But we believe the transaction should be by order of the House and publicly recorded, as we propose.

Judge Lawrence, in the same decision, says:

"The Revised Statutes (sec. 53) have created certain officers of the House. But each House has power to appoint other officers of its own creation, and to remove, and even to refuse to employ, those provided for by a statute of a previous Congress. The right to create appropriate offices, and to appoint officers, is given by the Constitution, and can not be taken away by a statute not assented to by the Congress affected thereby. A right or power given by the Constitution can not be taken away by a statute."

And further on in the same decision:

"* * * the House of the Forty-seventh had no power to provide a Speaker or any other officer for the House of the Forty-eighth Congress, because the Constitution gives to the House of each Congress the sole, uncontrolled, and independent power to choose and remove all its own officers at pleasure. Even a statute enacted by the Forty-seventh Congress could not take from the House of the Forty-eighth Congress its power to choose all its own officers. Such statute would be void. This appears so clearly by the words of the Constitution that no argument seems necessary to prove it. Neither the House of the Forty-seventh Congress, nor even a statute, could continue Grayson in office during any part of the Forty-eighth Congress against the choice or direction of the House of the latter Congress. If this could be done, a Speaker could equally, by the same forms, be imposed on the present House. The attempt to do so would be absurd."

The case under discussion at that time and decided by Judge Lawrence January 11, 1884 (1–48), was that of Davidson, appointed to succeed Grayson, whose employment by name was authorized by a resolution adopted by the House in the Forty-seventh Congress, known as "House appointees' case," and the question raised was as to "the authority of the House of Representatives of one Congress to remove a person holding his appointment under a statute enacted by or under color of a resolution of the House of a prior Congress." The syllabus, paragraphs 5 and 6, says:

"An act of Congress may continue the existence of such office or employment for either House of Congress, and may provide for the payment of the officer or employee so appointed, even after the Congress during which he was appointed has expired.

"But the House of Representatives of a subsequent Congress may remove any officer or employee so continued, and appoint another in his stead, or, by rule, authorize any proper officer to do so."

This decision has not been reversed by any succeeding comptroller.

It will be observed that Judge Lawrence throughout applies the term "officers" to other than those elected by the House, i. e., those commonly called "employees." In this he seems to have been fully justified and sustained. On June 11, 1886 (1–49), the legislative appropriation bill was under consideration in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, when the Clerk read the following paragraphs relating to employees in the office of Doorkeeper:

"For one employee (John T. Chancey), $1,500."

And also the following:

"Assistant Doorkeeper (George A. Bacon), to be employed in the document room, $2,000."

Mr. Eustace Gibson, of West Virginia, made the point of order that employees might not be designated on an appropriation bill.

After debate, the Chairman, Mr. James H. Blount, of Georgia, said:

"The Constitution gives to each House the right to select its own officers. The rules of this House prescribe the mode of choosing its officers here designated, to wit: The Doorkeeper shall designate his subordinates. It is done by virtue of the Constitution and has the full force of law, which will be disputed nowhere. Therefore the Chair thinks it is not in order to attempt on an appropriation bill to change a rule of this House. * * * It has been shown that Mr. Bacon, for instance, might be designated in this way by virtue of a resolution adopted by the House in 1881 (naming him) * * *. The Chair can not understand that in any other way than as related to that House. It can not be believed the purpose of the resolution was to be perpetuated in other Houses in violation of the Constitution providing each House shall appoint its own officers. The Chair therefore sustains the point of order." (Hinds' Precedents, Vol. IV, sec. 3819.)

We fail to find any decision contrary to the foregoing, although the practice still obtains, in a few instances, of designating subordinate officers of the House by name in an appropriation bill, but this has been permitted because the point against such provisions has not been raised.

Again, in Ordway's case, Judge Lawrence, comptroller, says:

"The House resolution of June 18, 1878, does not per se give a continuing authority to select or employ a person to prepare an index. It could not give authority to a committee of a subsequent House." (First Comptroller's Decisions, Vol. IV, p. 529.)

There are instances where the House dismissed its officers (Hinds' Precedents, Vol. I, secs. 287, 290) and other instances where it declared vacant the offices of Doorkeeper and Postmaster (Hinds' Precedents, Vol. I, secs. 288, 289, 292).

Your committee adopts the view so clearly expressed by Judge Lawrence that each House has power to remove, and even refuse to employ, officers provided for by a statute of a previous Congress, and that each House has the sole, uncontrolled, and independent power to choose and remove all its own officers at pleasure, and therefore recommends that certain offices be declared vacant.

Among the offices which the resolution declares vacant are a superintendent, special employee, document clerk, and assistant in the Clerk's document room, constituting its clerical force. The duties of these officers are chiefly to keep the files of documents delivered to the Clerk's office under the law, including testimony in contested-election cases, to receive and record requisitions of Members for binding documents, to distribute the Manual and Digest of the Rules and Practice of the House, and to distribute packing boxes to Members. It is proposed by the resolution to transfer the files of documents, reports, and testimony to the House document room, there to be kept separate and apart from other files and be distributed only upon the written order of the Clerk.

Section 54 of the printing and binding act of January 12, 1895, provides that 20 copies of each unbound document and report of the usual number printed shall be delivered to the Clerk's office of the House. They have been kept in two large rooms on the basement floor, near the restaurant, and under this resolution may remain there or be transferred to the House document room or other suitable place, but wherever kept will be hereafter in the custody of the Doorkeeper. The force of assistants in the House document room is ample to keep and distribute these documents, which would be called for only when the regular supply failed. That force also is ample for the work of filling requisitions for binding, and some duplication of work will be avoided by having it done in the House document room. The documents, in the main, first come from that room anyhow, and instead of being sent to the Clerk's document room and thence to the bindery, they will go, by one handling, direct from the House document room to the bindery. The duty of keeping an account thereof devolves by law upon the Clerk, who is directed by the resolution to detail a clerk from his office to perform this duty without extra compensation. The law as to this special binding says:

"Each Senator and Representative shall be entitled to the binding in half morocco, or material no more expensive, of but one copy of each public document to which he may be entitled, an account of which, with each Senator and Representative, shall be kept by the Secretary and Clerk, respectively." (Sec. 99, act of Jan. 12, 1895.)

It is also proposed that the Manual and Digest of the Rules and Practice of the House shall be distributed to Members, Delegates, and Resident Commissioners through the folding room, as are other bound documents under the law, which is as follows:

"All reports or documents to be distributed for Senators, Representatives, and Delegates shall be folded and distributed from the folding rooms, unless otherwise ordered, and each Senator, Representative, and Delegate shall be notified once every 60 days of the number and character of publications on hand and assigned to him for use and distribution." (Sec. 71, printing and binding act of Jan. 12, 1895.)

That the House Manual has not been so distributed is because "otherwise ordered." The House, on April 11, 1911, adopted this resolution:

"Resolved, That there be printed 2,000 copies of a Manual and Digest of the Rules and Practice of the House of Representatives for the first session of the Sixty-second Congress, the same to be bound and distributed under the direction of the Speaker and Clerk of the House." (RECORD, 1st sess. 62d Cong., p. 169.)

This is the usual resolution, and the Manual has always been distributed through the Clerk's document room, each Member being credited with five copies. But Members are not notified that they are entitled to the books, as in the case of books going to the folding room, and it was stated in the House in debate on the foregoing resolution that "some Members get more than their share and some get less than their share." By distribution pro rata through the folding room each Member would share and share alike, and be notified of his allowance.

The duty of distributing packing boxes for frankable matter remains that of the Clerk, and it will not impose a heavy duty on the force at his command to discharge it in such manner as the Clerk may direct. Heretofore these boxes have been distributed from the Clerk's document room. For the information of new Members we will state that an annual appropriation of $3,000 is made as a part of the House contingent fund for packing boxes, intended for the shipment of bulky frankable matter. This custom has obtained for many years, the item dating back to 1857, when "boxes for books" were provided for; in 1862 the term "packing boxes" was first and has since been employed. These boxes are secured by contract pursuant to the act of March 3, 1901 (Supp. R. S., vol. 2, p. 1530), and paid for out of the contingent fund upon vouchers approved by the Committee on Accounts. Each Member is entitled to 3 boxes—1 large pine, 1 large redwood, and 1 small pine. The latter is generally used for sending out bedding plants from the Botanic Garden to any given address, the box being labeled here and sent to the garden with a Member's frank. The large boxes are convenient for mailing documents and files of official correspondence to Members' homes at the end of a session.

In this connection attention is called to the fact that the printing and binding act approved January 12, 1895, in effect abolishes the Clerk's document room, and provides that all documents kept therein shall be transferred to the House document room. This provision of the act has never been expressly repealed, and is as follows:

"SEC. 60. There shall be one document room of the Senate and one of the House of Representatives, to be designated, respectively, the Senate and House document room.

"Each shall be in charge of a superintendent, who shall be appointed by the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate and the Doorkeeper of the House, respectively, who shall also appoint the necessary number of assistants: Provided, That this section shall not take effect until the first day of the first session of the Fifty-fourth Congress." (Supp. R. S., 1892–1897, p. 350.)

Attention is also called to House Report No. 7, first session Fifty-third Congress; also to the speech of Mr. Richardson, of Tennessee, then chairman of the Committee on Printing, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, first session Fifty-third Congress, page 1459.

From the discussion, from the report, and from the act itself it is clear that Congress intended to abolish and did abolish in the printing and binding act the Clerk's document room, and that the same now has no legal status or existence. The employees carrying on this work owe their employment to items in the appropriation bills providing for their salaries from year to year. We therefore submit that the proposed transfer of all these documents now in the Clerk's office to the House document room is not only in keeping with the caucus resolution, but in strict harmony with the law itself.

In the judgment of your committee, the accompanying resolution, if adopted, will make for more economical conduct of the business of the House of Representatives, consistent with efficiency, and will effect some reforms in administrative details that are shown by investigation to be necessary and desirable, and its adoption is therefore recommended.

The caucus resolution is as follows:

Be it resolved: SECTION 1. That the Committee on Accounts be, and the same is hereby, instructed to prepare and introduce such legislation as may be necessary to carry into effect the following changes in the appointive offices in the organization of the House of Representatives, to wit:

SEC. 2. That the Speaker shall have the right to name the persons to fill the positions included in the list of officers and employees of the House as compiled for the Committee on Accounts by William Tyler Page, Clerk, and published February 7, 1911, and named therein, "Under the Speaker," except such as shall be abolished in accordance with section 1 hereof; and that the Speaker shall also have the right to name the Journal clerk, now under the Clerk, and the messenger at the Speaker's desk, now under the Doorkeeper; and that the Sergeant at Arms, Doorkeeper, and Postmaster and Clerk of the House shall appoint none of their subordinates except upon the recommendation as hereinafter provided by the Committee on Organization.

SEC. 3. That the Democratic members of the Committee on Ways and Means be, and they are hereby, instructed to nominate to the caucus for its action a committee of three members, to be known as the Committee on Organization, who shall have charge of the proper distribution of all of the appointive places in the House organization as provided herein, except the cloakroom men and such other places as are by law or resolution to be filled by the minority. And that said committee shall distribute said appointive places amongst the members of the various State delegations, exclusive of committee chairmen having patronage as under section 4, giving to each State the proportion in number of places and aggregate salaries thereof, as nearly as may be done, which its Democratic delegation bears to the entire Democratic membership of the House, excluding such chairmen, leaving to the individual members of the several State delegations or the several State delegations the nomination of persons to the places to which such State shall be so entitled; provided that each Member from a State shall receive, so far as practicable, a fair and equal proportion of the patronage to which his State is entitled; and said committee to have entire charge of the adjustment of such appointive places after the nominations have been made to said committee by the various State delegations; and the several elective officers of the House shall appoint only such persons to fill the various appointive offices as shall have been named by the said Committee on Organization, provided that the elective officers shall not be charged to any Member or delegation.

SEC. 4. That in the distribution of patronage, the clerk, assistant clerk, janitor, messenger, or other employees of each standing committee shall be charged to the chairman of the committee, who shall have the right to appoint the same by and with the approval of his committee; and that such chairman shall receive no other patronage until every other member shall have been given the opportunity to name the occupants of positions, whose salaries shall equal those of the persons so appointed by the respective committee chairmen.

SEC. 5. That the practice which has heretofore obtained of annually giving to the various employees of the House one month's extra pay shall be discontinued.

SEC. 6. That the following committees of the House shall be abolished, to wit:

Pacific Railroads,
Manufactures,
Militia,
Private Land Claims,
Levees and Improvements of the Mississippi River,
Ventilation and Acoustics.

and that the Committee on Rules be, and they are hereby, instructed to report such changes in the rules of the House as shall be necessary to carry this section into effect.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER].

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Speaker, I have not paid very much attention to the legal phase of the propositions involved in the proposed abolishing of these House offices, and I do not propose to discuss the question whether this resolution is the proper way to carry out the order of the Democratic caucus held on April 1 or not. I assume that it is. I have, however, given some attention and study to the merits of the proposition and much consideration to the question of whether any proper economies could be effected in the House organization, and it is to the merits of the proposition that I wish to address myself.

Mr. Speaker, the Democratic Party believes in economy as a principle of Government. From the time of the first inaugural of Thomas Jefferson as President of the United States down to the day, about six weeks ago, when the present Speaker of the House delivered his first inaugural as the presiding officer of this House every leader of the party, both in the Nation and in the Congress, has taken a strong stand for economy in the public expenditures.

Jefferson said, in his first inaugural address:

Economy in the public expense, that labor may be lightly burdened, I deem one of the essential principles of our Government and, consequently, one which ought to shape its administration.

And in his second annual message to Congress he said:

To expend the public money with the same care and economy that we would practice with our own is one of the landmarks by which we are to guide ourselves in all our proceedings.

And again this great leader of the Democratic Party and true expounder of its principles used this language:

When merely by avoiding false objects of expense we are able without a direct tax, without internal taxes, and without borrowing to make large and effectual payments toward the discharge of our public debt and the emancipation of our posterity from that moral canker it is an encouragement of the highest order to proceed as we have begun in substituting economy for taxation and in pursuing what is useful for a nation placed as we are, rather than what is practiced by others under different circumstances.

Some of the strongest utterances of the one Democratic President since the Civil War were in behalf of a rigid and frugal economy in governmental expense. In his second inaugural address President Cleveland said:

Every thoughtful American must realize the importance of checking at its beginning any tendency in public or private station to regard frugality and economy as virtues which we may safely outgrow. The toleration of this idea results in the waste of the people's money by their chosen servants and encourages prodigality and extravagance in the home life of our countrymen.

Under our scheme of government the waste of public money is a crime against the citizen.

It is a plain dictate of honesty and good government that public expenditures should be limited by public necessity, and that this should be measured by the rules of strict economy; and it is equally clear that frugality among the people is the best guaranty of a contented and strong support of free institutions.

And in 1891, in a public address, Mr. Cleveland made a striking statement covering the relation between public extravagance and inequitable tariff taxation, when he said:

Our Democratic faith teaches us that the useless exaction of money from the people, upon the false pretext of public necessity, is the worst of all governmental perversions, and involves the greatest of all dangers to our guarantees of justice and equity. We need not unlearn this lesson to apprehend the fact that behind the fact that such exaction, and as its source of existence, is found public extravagance. The ax will not be laid at the root of the unwholesome tariff tree, with its vicious inequality and injustice, until we reach and destroy its parent and support.

But the growth of public extravagance in these latter days, and its unconcealed and dreadful manifestations, force us to the contemplation of other crimes, of which it is undoubtedly guilty, besides unjust exactions from the people.

Public extravagance, in its relation to inequitable tariff laws, not only lays an unjust tribute upon the people, but is responsible for unfair advantages bestowed upon special and favored interests as the price of partisan support. Thus the exercise of the popular will, for the benefit of the country at large, is replaced by sordid and selfish motives directed to personal advantage, while the encouragement of such motives in public places for party ends deadens the official conscience.

Public extravagance directly distributes gifts and gratuities among the people, whose toleration of waste is thus secured, or whose past party services are thus compensated, or who are thus bribed to future party support. This makes the continuance of partisan power a stronger motive among public servants than the faithful discharge of the people's trust, and sows the seeds of contagious corruption in the body politic.

Every platform of the Democratic Party during the past 16 years has contained a ringing denunciation of the waste, the extravagance, and the profligacy which have entered into every department of the Government, and everyone has condemned the Republican Party for failing to put into force that economical administration of the people's affairs, for which we have stood as a party for a century in this Republic. The platforms of the Democratic Party in this respect are in rather striking contrast to those of the Republican Party, for you may search Republican national platforms with a microscope and a magnifying glass and you will not anywhere find any condemnation of waste or extravagance in the operations of the Goverment, or any pledge or promise on the part of that party that, if intrusted with power, it would enforce a retrenchment in the expenditures of the Government. You will nowhere find in the platforms of that party any answer to the most severe indictment which has ever been presented against it as an administrative party when he, who was probably its most typical leader in the last Congress, asserted in the other branch of this Congress that the Government could be operated on a business basis with a saving of $300,000,000 annually below the amount that it now costs to run the several branches of the Government. Having come into power in this House we propose, along with the other features of the Democratic program upon which we have already started, to do real work toward accomplishing an economical, if not a frugal, administration of the Government in every branch.

On this question of extravagance, recent Democratic platform declarations have been as follows:

Democratic platform, 1908:

We denounce the needless waste of the people's money, which has resulted in the appalling increase, as a shameful violation of all prudent considerations of government and as no less than a crime against the millions of workingmen and women, from whose earnings the great proportion of these colossal sums must be extorted through excessive tariff exactions and other indirect methods. It is not surprising that, in the face of this shocking record, the Republican platform contains no reference to economical administration or promise thereof in the future. We demand that a stop be put to this frightful extravagance, and insist upon the strictest economy in every department, compatible with frugal and efficient administration.

Democratic platform, 1904:

Large reductions can easily be made in the annual expenditures of the Government without impairing the efficiency of any branch of the public service, and we shall insist upon the strictest economy and frugality compatible with vigorous and efficient civil, military, and naval administration as a right of the people too clear to be denied or withheld.

We favor the enforcement of honesty in the public service, and to that end a thorough legislative investigation of those executive departments of the Government already known to teem with corruption, as well as other departments suspected of harboring corruption, and the punishment of ascertained corruptionists, without fear or favor or regard to persons. The persistent and deliberate refusal of both the Senate and the House of Representatives to permit such investigation to be made demonstrates that only by a change in the executive and in the legislative departments can complete exposure, punishment, and correction be obtained.

Democratic platform, 1900:

We denounce the lavish appropriations of recent Republican Congresses, which have kept taxes high and which threaten the perpetuation of the oppressive war levies. We oppose the accumulation of a surplus, to be squandered in such barefaced frauds upon the taxpayers as the shipping subsidy bill, which, under the false pretense of prospering American shipbuilding, would put unearned millions into the pockets of favorite contributors to the Republican campaign fund. We favor the reduction and speedy repeal of the war taxes, and a return to the time-honored Democratic policy of strict economy in governmental expenditures.

Democratic platform, 1896:

We denounce the profligate waste of the money wrung from the people by oppressive taxation and the lavish appropriations of recent Republican Congresses, which have kept taxes high, while the labor that pays them is unemployed, and the products of the people's toil are depressed in price till they no longer repay the cost of production. We demand a return to that simplicity and economy which befits a democratic government, and a reduction in the number of useless offices, the salaries of which drain the substance of the people.

It is no secret, and I am divulging no secrets, either of the committee which named the majority members of the committees of this House, in the first instance, or of the caucus which adopted its recommendations, when I say that this House in this Congress is deliberately organized, as far as its committee assignments are concerned, with an eye singly to putting into force that principle of democracy which we know as economy in the public expense. [Applause on the Democratic side.] That is no idle statement, and if Members take the trouble to examine the personnel of the committees of this House which are charged with the duty of preparing and reporting appropriation bills they will find that the party has been careful to see to it that those committees shall be constituted of men who are absolutely sincere in their desire and will prove fearless in their attempt to work rigid economies in all matters of expenditure for governmental purposes.

We put into force two or three rules in the selection of these committees which have never obtained before in the House. For instance, no chairman of any committee which is charged with the duty of presenting appropriation bills to the House is permitted to serve on any other committee of the House. And again, no member of the Appropriations Committee, whether chairman or "private in the ranks," is permitted to serve on any other committee of the House. So that, as a result, we have the appropriation committees manned by men whose interest for economy and whose stand between those who would grasp the public funds and the Treasury of the United States will not be affected by any interest which might come to them by reason of service on any of the other legislative committees of the House. We believe that to be in the interest of economy.

In addition, we placed upon the heretofore ornamental committees, which have been serving no useful purpose for many years—the committees on expenditures of the various departments—men who had shown their fitness by reason of accomplishments in the past to do real work of investigation into the question of extravagance in the various departments of the Government. I know that this disease of activity on the part of these committees has broken out in Congress before, but it has never become an epidemic until the beginning of this Sixty-second Congress. And these committees have been manned—I almost said they are pledged, for fidelity to the party's platform amounts to such a pledge—from amongst the men whom we knew to be earnest and sincere in their desire to accomplish these retrenchments and reforms.

So, in every direction the Democratic Party in this House has made a start, which, if carried out to its logical conclusion, as we hope to do, may put into accomplished fact the statement of the former leader of the Republican Party as to the enormous amount of the annual saving that could have been accomplished by his party in the operation of the Government if it were pursued in a businesslike way. Now, that being the general program, we started it right here in this House, on the theory that we could hardly go to the other departments of the Government, especially to the various executive departments in this city, with a demand for greater economies in their administration, if we did not first put into force the strictest economy in the administration of this House.

With the idea of seeing where these economies could be effected I have made some investigation of the duties performed by the various officers and employees of the House, and I am prepared to state as my deliberate judgment, based upon that investigation, that while it now costs the Treasury of the United States approximately $900,000 to manage this House per annum, if I could get the contract to perform all the service which is performed for the House by its employees and appointive officers, I would undertake to furnish just as efficient and complete service as has been performed during the past Congress or two, for $500,000 per annum. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And I would be willing to enter into bond that I would perform through my appointees just as efficient service as has been performed in the past. And if I did not make $100,000 or $150,000 a year out of my contract I would be willing to forfeit my bond. [Applause on the Democratic side.] To that extent, in my judgment, have waste, extravagance, and profligacy entered into the management and operation of this House.

Now, I understand that last week, on a day when I was not present in the House, some Members on the other side talked about this economy plan as put through the Democratic caucus on April 1 as a mere "hurrah for economy," and made the assertion that we had put none of it into actual force, had not saved a dollar for the Government, and some doubt was expressed as to whether we could or would save very much.

I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that we have already actually put into force all the legislation which is necessary to save $107,000 per year, and according to my figures and calculations, if we pass the resolution which is now before the House and the other joint resolution referred to by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. FLOYD], in reference to the Capitol police, we will have actually accomplished an annual saving of $228,745.26.

I noted what the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] said a few minutes ago about the likelihood of our putting some of these places back. It reminded me of what our genial friend, the former Clerk of the House, Maj. McDowell, told me when I first began my little investigation into the duties of these officers. He said, "Oh, yes; you can wipe out all these jobs, but in six weeks somebody will put them all back." The prophecy of the Clerk of the House and of the former Speaker of the House is based upon something else than the history and course of the Democratic Party in this Congress. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And I think we can say to you that there will not be put back any considerable number of these places that are now cut out, although there may be some new minor officers created, which, from the investigation already made, it appears may be necessary to accomplish greater efficiency than has prevailed in the past, but those restored, together with such new places, positively will not exceed in annual salary $12,000 or $15,000 at the outside.

I made the statement in the caucus of the Democratic Party on April 1 that we would save $182,000 by this economy program in the House. I say now that even if the House puts back $25,000 of the places which are wiped out by this resolution, we would still save per annum an amount in excess of that I stated in the Democratic caucus on April 1, and the reason for that is that in the estimate that I made at that time of the amount paid to the employees of the House by way of gratuity at the end of every session I was 50 per cent low, it being simply an estimate based upon information received from others and not from an examination of the statutes. For it now develops that during the Sixty-first Congress we actually paid to the employees and appointive officers of the House three months' extra salary, which amounted to a total of over $203,000.

From my observation the salaries of the various appointive officers of the House have been liberal, and in consideration of the duties they perform have been ample as compensation. As to most of them, they do nothing when the House is not in session. And so we are before the country in the attitude of first having given our employees every dollar that the law allows them as salary, and liberal salary at that, and then, having given them an average of six months' vacation in every year, and in addition to that a month and a half's salary in every year.

Mr. SIMS. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. PALMER. I do.

Mr. SIMS. I heard what the gentleman was saying, but I want to ask him what position we will be put in if those employees in the other body get the extra month's salary? In other words, can the Appropriations Committee or this House prevent the employees in the other body from getting the extra month's salary? Can we do anything to stop that?

Mr. PALMER. As I understand it, the appropriation must be made by general law. The appropriation must be passed in the usual way.

Mr. SIMS. I did not know what the courtesy might be as between the two bodies about letting each body provide for its own employees.

Mr. BARTLETT. I will say to the gentleman that it is always done on an appropriation bill, and it is not carried by a resolution or joint resolution. It is always in an appropriation bill, and generally in a deficiency bill.

Mr. PALMER. It is carried in a deficiency appropriation bill as compensation to the employees of the House and Senate, but separately.

Mr. BARTLETT. My recollection is, and I think I am correct, that in each year that it has been done it has gone on an appropriation bill. Sometimes it has been put on in the Senate as an amendment, that the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House be directed to pay to the employees of the Senate and House one month's extra pay. That is the usual way, and it has been done by law.

Mr. PALMER. I think that is the usual way, and I so stated. I stated at the outset that I did not propose to discuss the manner in which these reforms could be carried out; but we have so gone on record, so far as this House is concerned, that the Appropriations Committee will not report any provision in a deficiency appropriation bill or any other bill providing for the payment of this gratuity to the employees of the House, and neither will this side of the House vote for such an appropriation.

Mr. MANN. No Appropriations Committee ever has reported such a provision.

Mr. PALMER. I beg the gentleman's pardon. That is almost true, but not quite. It has been reported in a deficiency appropriation bill from the committee once or twice.

Mr. MANN. Not since I have been here.

Mr. PALMER. But as a rule it has been put on on the floor of the House.

Mr. MANN. Why does the gentleman say a month and a half extra salary?

Mr. PALMER. Because during the Sixty-first Congress there were three sessions, and a month's salary was given at the end of each session.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; there was no extra month's salary given at the end of the extra session.

Mr. PALMER. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There was not in the short session which convened in November a few years ago.

Mr. PALMER. I have the entire record here.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman may be correct.

The SPEAKER. To whom does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield?

Mr. PALMER. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. I will not interrupt the gentleman.

Mr. PALMER. If I am incorrect about the statement, it is an error made by the clerk of the Committee on Appropriations, who furnished me with a statement going all the way back to the Forty-fifth Congress, in reference to the history of this extra month's pay, and that statement shows that formerly one month's pay was given during a Congress. Then it gradually grew to a month's pay at the end of each regular session. That did not occur until during the last 16 years. Recently it was given at the end of every session, whether extra or regular, and during the Sixty-first Congress, as I stated, it aggregated $203,000. This statement prepared by the clerk of the Appropriations Committee I will print in the RECORD and not read now.

Extra month's pay, 1879–1911:

Forty-fifth Congress.—To all employees of the House and Senate not on annual rolls. (Mar. 3, 1879; vol. 20, p. 489.)

Forty-sixth Congress.—To all officers and employees of the House on the annual roll. (July 1, 1879; vol. 21, p. 456.)

Forty-seventh Congress.—Given at both sessions to all officers and employees of the House and Senate on annual and session rolls. (Aug. 7, 1882; Mar. 3, 1883; vol. 22, pp. 338, 632.)

Forty-eighth Congress.—Given at both sessions as above. (July 7, 1884; Mar. 3, 1885; vol. 23, pp. 226, 469.)

Forty-ninth Congress.—None.

Fiftieth Congress.—Given at last session only as above. (Mar. 2, 1889; vol. 25, p. 928.)

Fifty-first Congress.—Given at last session only as above. (Mar. 3, 1891; vol. 26, p. 885.)

Fifty-second Congress.—Given at last session only as above. (Mar. 3, 1893; vol. 27, p. 664.)

Fifty-third Congress.—Given at extra session and also for last session as above. (Dec. 21, 1893; Mar. 2, 1895; vol. 28, pp. 20, 864.)

Fifty-fourth Congress.—Given at last session only as above, on the general deficiency bill, which failed at that session but was enacted at the extra session of the Fifty-fifth Congress. (June 4, 1897; vol. 30, p. 59.)

Fifty-fifth Congress.—Extra session, none. Given at both regular sessions as above. (July 7, 1898; Mar. 3, 1899; vol. 30, pp. 685, 1241.)

Fifty-sixth Congress.—Given at both sessions as above. (June 6, 1900; Mar. 3, 1901; vol. 31, pp. 310, 1048.)

Fifty-seventh Congress.—Given at both sessions as above. (July 1, 1902; Mar. 3, 1903; vol. 32, pp. 583, 1066.)

Fifty-eighth Congress.—Extra session, none. Given at both regular sessions as above. (Apr. 27, 1904; Mar. 3, 1905; vol. 33, pp. 419, 1246.)

Fifty-ninth Congress.—Given at both sessions as above. (June 30, 1906; Mar. 4, 1907; vol. 34, pp. 660, 1394.)

Sixtieth Congress.—Given at both sessions as above. (May 30, 1908; Mar. 4, 1909; vol. 35, pp. 511, 931.)

Sixty-first Congress.—Given at each of three sessions as above. (Aug. 5, 1909; June 25, 1910; Mar. 4, 1911; vol. 36, pp. 127, 804, 1317.)

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my time may be extended 30 minutes. I have agreed to parcel out the time, and it will require about that much.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that his time be extended 30 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PALMER. I should like 20 minutes more.

Mr. LLOYD. Then I ask to change my request so that my time be extended one hour.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman wait until the Chair puts the request? The gentleman from Missouri asks that his time be extended one hour. Is there objection?

Mr. CARLIN. I will not object. I was going to. We have a lot of other measures that we want to consider on the same subject.

Mr. LLOYD. I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. AUSTIN rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN].

Mr. PALMER. I do.

Mr. AUSTIN. I wish to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania if in making his investigation he did not also find that the Senate are paying larger salaries to their corresponding officers than are being paid by the House?

Mr. PALMER. I will say to the gentleman very frankly that I did not investigate the question of the Senate employees. I do not know whether the gentleman's implication is correct or not.

Now, I have stated that so far the work which has been done has been all that is necessary to save $107,000. The remaining sum of $6,000, in addition to the amount which I have named as being a gratuity given to the officers for a single year, as based on the appropriations of the Sixty-first Congress, has been that saved by the abolishing of the six committees, reference to which was made by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. FLOYD], and in which I figure the actual saving in the salaries of employees of those committees to be $6,000.

The Committee on Rules has already reported, and the House has adopted, a system of rules for this Congress which abolishes the following committees: Pacific Railroads, Manufactures, Militia, Private Land Claims, Levees and Improvements of the Mississippi River, and Ventilation and Acoustics. All of these committees have outlived their usefulness, and none of them has reported any legislation for a long time, except, perhaps, the Committee on Militia; and the former jurisdiction of this committee has been added to the jurisdiction of the Committee on Military Affairs, which we believe to be in the interest of efficiency and economy in legislation in the House.

Now, the additional savings which we accomplish by this resolution and by the other resolution referred to by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. FLOYD] cover $82,010 by the pending resolution and $39,000 for the salaries of the policemen who are proposed to be abolished by the joint resolution. The largest single items in the reductions which are made by these two resolutions, which may be treated together, are in the matter of these two police forces. I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that I doubt if there is an office building in the world, unless it be, perhaps, the Senate Office Building, at the other end of the park, which is so carefully policed and guarded as the House Office Building. The law authorizes 21 men in the police force of the House Office Building, and there are actually in the service now 18 men.

Mr. MANN. And 8 would be sufficient.

Mr. PALMER. We have cut it down to about 10.

Mr. MANN. Well, I am very glad of it.

Mr. PALMER. I made some investigation of other office buildings in various parts of the country, and it was upon that investigation that I base my statement that no building in the land is so carefully guarded as is that House Office Building. For instance, the Land Title Building of the city of Philadelphia, which has about 1,100 rooms, with 365 tenants and probably 1,500 occupants, situated in the very center of the great city of Philadelphia, is guarded and policed by 4 men, about one-fourth or a little less of the number required to police and keep order in the House Office Building.

The same situation prevails, only to a more absurd extent, in the Capitol police force. This force, consisting now of a captain and 72 men, is charged with the duty of keeping order within the confines of Capitol Park. Their jurisdiction does not extend beyond the coping of the park and is confined to a space about the size, I should say, of four or five city blocks, with one building upon it, peopled, I may say, by law-abiding citizens. Yet it is supposed to require 73 men to keep order and do the ordinary work of policemen about this building and about the park. I took a half day off some time ago and "gunned" around the park, looking for these policemen. I found first that 71 of them are supposed to be in uniform, so that it is easy for a Representative in Congress to recognize a cop when he sees one; but despite my most searching inquiry in every nook and corner of the Capitol and the park, I was unable that day to find more than 11 of these policemen. I do not mean to say that they are soldiering on the job, but I do mean to say the order which does prevail hereabouts with only 11 working is sufficient argument to sustain the proposition that we can safely cut this force down one-half.

I made a comparison of the police force of the Capitol with the police force of some of the cities of the country.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PALMER. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. Did the gentleman investigate how many were on duty at night, and might that not be the reason why he was not able to find them?

Mr. PALMER. I understand that there are three shifts—one-third on for eight hours, one-third for another eight hours, and one-third for another.

Mr. MADDEN. Did the gentleman make the investigation during each of the eight hours?

Mr. PALMER. No; I made the investigation during only two of the eight hours. It is possible the rest of them were on the job at night, but I doubt it. I stated a moment ago that I had made a comparison with the police forces of a number of well-governed cities, and I found, for instance, the city of Harrisburg, a law-abiding and orderly city beyond doubt, the home of my distinguished colleague, Mr. OLMSTED, and which contains a capitol park, with a legislature in session nearly as much as this Congress, and consisting of no more virtuous and law-abiding men than this Congress contains, with a population of 64,186, is policed, legislature, capitol, and all, with a force of 54 men, at a gross salary of $49,920 per annum. The city of Easton, Pa., which is the largest town in my own district, and which I know to be a law-abiding and orderly town, with a population of 28,523, with contiguous city population of as much more, with a college in its midst, with twice as many students as there are Members of Congress—students frequently bent upon fun and fond of playing the kind of pranks that worry the minions of the law and require services of a policeman now and then—is policed by a force of 20 men, at an expense of $14,700 per annum. As I say, this Capitol Park, as big as four city blocks, with a single building on it, requires 73 policemen, at a salary of $78,150 per annum.

Why, if instead of being an establishment for the making of the laws it were a penitentiary to incarcerate men as a punishment for breaking the laws, the Government would not have need for a force half as large as that which has been maintained about this Capitol Park. [Applause on the Democratic side.] It used to be 26 in number, if I am not mistaken. The report was—though I shall not vouch for the story as being the fact, as it was before my time—but the report got abroad that some Member's wife had been told by another Member's cousin at a tea party in the northwest section of the city that a stick of dynamite had been found in a coal bin in the Capitol along about the time of the Spanish War. Promptly thereafter, in fear of the institution being blown to the high heavens, the police force was increased about 100 per cent or more. The scare subsequently subsided, but the police force remained.

Now, some of these places which we have cut out in the House organization——

Mr. GARNER. May I interrupt the gentleman just a moment before he goes to that?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. PALMER. I yield, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. GARNER. If I remember correctly, the gentleman said the law now authorizes 21 policemen for the House Office Building. This resolution only cuts out 7 members of the force. That would leave, if I get the gentleman correctly, but 14 members for the House Office Building, when in reality there are only 18 now in service.

Mr. PALMER. Yes; we cut those out of these now in service, and my information is that 21 are authorized; but I will say that is hearsay. I have not examined the law and I am not sure about it being the fact.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PALMER. Yes.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I investigated, and the list of the force carried only 18.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PALMER. Yes.

Mr. SAUNDERS. The gentleman gave the facts in reference to this building which the gentleman investigated. Why can not the policemen in our House Office Building be reduced to the number that polices that office in Philadelphia, I think it was——

Mr. PALMER. Well, I think it could be——

Mr. SAUNDERS. Say to a half a dozen.

Mr. PALMER. We did not care to be too drastic about this thing all at once. We felt that every door in the building should be manned by a policeman and that one officer might patrol each floor, on the theory that those men do have some other little duty to perform besides that of keeping order, namely, directing visitors to various quarters in the building.

Now, in the House organization itself I do not propose to go over the list of offices which have been abolished, but to refer only to a few. In some cases we found men were being carried on the rolls who were not performing any service whatever about the Capitol. We found other men being carried on the rolls in one position who were performing service of an entirely different kind not authorized by law. We wiped out all such places. For instance, the pay roll carries an officer known as the assistant stenographer to committees, a place now filled or heretofore filled by one Johnson. Our information was, and I know it to be the fact, that this assistant stenographer to committees, though a skilled stenographer, has never taken a line of testimony before any committee in the House——

Mr. MANN. Who is that?

Mr. PALMER. The assistant stenographer to committees.

Mr. MANN. I suppose the gentleman means he has not taken a line of testimony during the Sixty-first Congress.

Mr. PALMER. Well, I will say that; but the information which I received from the stenographers to committees went much further back than that.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is mistaken about that——

Mr. PALMER. Again, I say, if it is a mistake it is a mistake of others, because my statement is that of the stenographers to committees, who say that he has not assisted them for some Congresses.

Mr. MANN. That is very likely.

Mr. PALMER. Well, I am not charging anything.

Mr. MANN. I understand. Let me tell what I know.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. PALMER. I will not make any charge that any man is improperly placed——

Mr. CANNON. Just that the facts may be known——

Mr. PALMER. How much time have I left, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has five minutes left.

Mr. PALMER. I will state what the assistant stenographer to committees has done, and I think that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] will say afterwards that I have stated it with absolute correctness.

Mr. LLOYD. I will yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. PALMER. This assistant stenographer to committees has been used in the Speaker's office as a clerk or amanuensis during the recent Congress, and, perhaps, more than during one Congress.

Mr. CANNON. Yes. He commenced, as I understand it, as far back, perhaps, as Speaker Reed; anyway, as far back as Speaker Henderson, the employees, if the gentleman will yield to me, in the Speaker's office being——

Mr. PALMER. I yield only for a question.

Mr. CANNON. Then I will try and get my own time, although there is no secret about it.

Mr. PALMER. Oh, no.

Mr. CANNON. And never has been.

Mr. PALMER. Certainly. Well, the position which we have taken is simply this: It does not involve any misconduct on the part of any employee or any officer, past or present, of the House. It is simply this: That since the Speaker of the House receives $4,500 a year more in salary than the ordinary Member, and since he has a private secretary at $4,000 a year, and a parliamentary clerk at $3,600 a year, and a messenger at his desk at $1,200 a year, and a messenger at the door of his office at $1,400 a year, and an additional clerk at $1,600 a year, and in addition to that has the same appropriation of $1,500 for clerk hire that a Member of the House has, we felt that he ought to be able to get along with that force without taking a man from the force of the stenographers to committees. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And I may say that since the present Speaker of the House has gone into office this assistant stenographer to committees has not been attached to the Speaker's office.

The Speaker has been getting along with this other force that I referred to, and, in our judgment, the Speaker's office is being run with just as great efficiency as in the immediate or remote past. [Applause on the Democratic side.] So that we felt that if this man was not so necessary to the stenographers to the committees that they could spare him, and if he was not necessary to the Speaker, by reason of the size of his office force, the place could be abolished. And so, amongst other things, we abolished that place.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. PALMER. I will yield for a question.

Mr. AUSTIN. That is what I wished to ask you. I want him to give us a reason why the position of Assistant Doorkeeper, created by the First Congress, was abolished?

Mr. PALMER. I will say this to the gentleman: We believed that the duties of the office could be performed by the Doorkeeper without an assistant, and we have already demonstrated the fact, because the present Doorkeeper of the House is performing all the duties of the Doorkeeper and those heretofore performed by the Assistant Doorkeeper. And, although the gentleman who has been upon the floor, and is now upon the roll, as the Assistant Doorkeeper of the House, and is therefore entitled to receive the compensation, has been made by the minority in this Congress a minority employee, and has been taken away from the duties of Assistant Doorkeeper, the House seems to be getting along very nicely without him.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. LLOYD. I promised to yield five minutes more to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Speaker, while I am on the Doorkeeper's department I want to mention another place that we abolished, namely, that of clerk to the Doorkeeper. I would not discuss this $1,200 place if it were not for the fact that the newspaper reports of the caucus action may possibly have done some injustice to a worthy officer of the House, Mr. Lyon, and his daughter, who was on the pay roll as the clerk to the Doorkeeper. The fact was that when we came to consider the Doorkeeper's department we were unable to find Miss Lyon, who was carried as the clerk to the Doorkeeper.

Diligent inquiry from those employees of the Doorkeeper's department whom we could see brought out the fact that she had not been here for a considerable length of time, and it was reported to us that she was a young girl, and it was so stated in the Democratic caucus. After that resolution went through the caucus the Doorkeeper of the House, Mr. Lyon, believing that an injustice had been done to him, stated to me—and I am now putting his statement before the House—that his daughter was not a young girl, but that she is actually 24 years of age. It developed, however, according to his statement, that she has not been in Washington since the opening of the short session of the Sixty-first Congress, and had been here only occasionally at times before that. She first went on the roll as the clerk to the Doorkeeper of the House at the beginning of the Fifty-eighth Congress, when, as you will see by a little arithmetical calculation, she had arrived at the age of 15 years.

We felt that a place which could be used in that way was not so necessary for the proper operation of the House but that we could dispense with it, and that is included in this resolution.

It is just to former Doorkeeper Lyon to say that he viewed the clerkship as a confidential appointment, as shown by his statement contained in a letter which he handed me after the caucus action, which was as follows:

> My daughter, Miss Lena M. Lyon, has been clerk to the Doorkeeper since August 1, 1909. She was 24 years of age the 6th day of last December, and I trust I may be pardoned in saying that she has rendered me much valuable service.
> As far back as I am able to discover, the clerk to the Doorkeeper has always been a confidential appointment, the same as the clerks or secretaries to each individual Member, and I regret that my successor, Mr. Sinnott, is to be deprived of the services of his clerk, for I am sure he can at this time convince any Member that he absolutely needs the services of a confidential clerk.

Now, among the other places that we abolished are the two telegraph operators, officials who have been sitting beside a silent telegraph instrument in the lobby of the House ever since the telephones were installed, and who ought long since to have gone the way that the riding pages ought to go, who were put upon the force of the House before we had street cars or automobiles or telephones.

Many years ago a telegraph line was installed connecting the Capitol with the various executive departments in this city. Members and committees used this wire for the purpose of securing information from the departments necessary in the preparation of legislation, and two telegraph operators, at an annual salary of $1,400 each, were employed to transmit these messages. During the last session of Congress the sum of $500 was carried in the sundry civil bill for the maintenance of this telegraph line. With the installation of telephones in every office in the Capitol and on the floor of the House the use of the telegraph wire was practically abandoned, but the operators have ever since been carried on the rolls. Now, on infrequent occasions a committee clerk will send a telegram summoning witnesses from the departments to appear before his committee or a subcommittee, but we believe the telephone and the mail service will be sufficient for all of this work. If it should be necessary for any committee to transmit messages to the departments in the city, it will be noted that 15,000 messages per annum at the Government rate could be sent over the Western Union wires for the amount of salary paid these operators. These places are sinecures, pure and simple.

We abolished also two watchmen downstairs in the folding room—night watchmen. We believed that with a police force of the size that this House was willing to carry the folding room could get along at night without these watchmen.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. They were watching the police force, evidently.

Mr. PALMER. Yes. Or I suppose they could get along without the policemen.

We have reduced the force of messengers under the Doorkeeper by nine, drawing an aggregate annual salary of $10,620, the balance of the messengers being sufficient to man each of the doors of the House Chamber with two men at all times. Similarly, the force of laborers has been reduced and two foremen and some other minor places, and in every case not only are we satisfied that the efficiency of the organization of the House will not be impaired by abolishing these places, but that, if anything, this action will result in better service. In nearly all cases the abolishing of these inferior places has received the indorsement of men heretofore employed in the various departments, whom we believe to have thorough and accurate knowledge of the needs of each of the departments in the House organization.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I shall not go into the other places at length, except that I want to say this: That after the investigation that we made, after a little more careful consideration of all the facts in relation to some of these places, I for one am prepared to agree that three or four of the places named in the resolution ought to go back, and I hope that the Committee on Accounts, which has already received my views in relation to that matter, will report a resolution to put back some of those places, not to exceed, however, in gross salaries, as I stated before, about $12,000 a year.

For instance, I am rather convinced that although the force in the Journal clerk's office has been outrageously large, although it has been absolutely unnecessary to have an assistant Journal clerk and a stenographer and a messenger and a janitor and an index clerk and an assistant index clerk, all engaged in the same work of preparing an index to the Journal to be published at the close of every session of Congress, still I think that the index and the Journal being of such prime importance the Journal clerk is entitled to have one man who will do nothing else but work at the index——

Mr. MANN. May I ask the gentleman a question——

Mr. PALMER (continuing). And I therefore would favor the putting back on the roll the place of index clerk.

Mr. MANN. Does not the index clerk index the RECORD?

Mr. PALMER. I think not.

Mr. MANN. He certainly did a year or two ago.

Mr. PALMER. He did not the last time I talked with him, which was since that time. He indexes the Journal.

Mr. MANN. The index clerk, who occupied a room down here at the time we made the distribution of rooms, with the assistant index clerks, prepared the index to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. PALMER. I would be glad to have five minutes more.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for an additional five minutes.

Mr. PALMER. The Journal clerk has of late years been a stenographer and typewriter. The present Journal clerk, appointed by the Speaker, is a stenographer. He informs me that, so far as his experience has gone, he does not believe it necessary to have an assistant in the work of preparing the Journal and publishing it, as required by the Constitution and the rules of the House. But in a regular session of Congress it is quite possible that larger duties would devolve upon that office. The fact is that the Journal is now made up the Journal clerk making his daily entries in shorthand, transcribing them on the typewrter at night or the following morning, inserting in the loose sheets excerpts from the RECORD which will cover the case, and that Journal is signed, or supposed to be signed, by the Speaker, and when bound together becomes the original official Journal of the House. That work can all be done by the Journal clerk, and always has been done by the Journal clerk; and, with the exception of the constitutional requirement that the Journal be published from time to time, that is the entire duty of the Journal clerk. That publishing is done in the Printing Office, and the indexing can be done by one man. So that we would accomplish a saving of several thousand dollars by cutting out these places that, I assume, are simply sinecures.

Now, the other radical change in the House organization is that which is involved in the rearrangement of the several bill, petition, and resolution clerks' offices. We propose to cut them all out and to substitute for them a chief bill clerk, with four assistants, so that these assistants can be assigned on busy days, at the beginning of Congress and at the end of the session, to the peculiar duties that heretofore have been performed only by one or the other of these officers. The trouble has always been that the man who occupies the position of petition and bill clerk will do nothing except what pertains to his office. If there were a chief bill clerk, in time of busy stress in the House he could delegate his assistants to do this work, which is the up-to-date, businesslike, scientific method of doing that kind of work.

I want to say here, before I conclude, that another change that I would like to see made in this resolution, a change that I suggested at the time of the caucus, which, however, has not gone into the resolution as yet, is a change which will permit the House to continue to have the benefit of the service of the one scientific, up-to-date, systematic officer in that whole department, and that is the notification clerk. In my judgment, he performs a service of inestimable value to this House. [Applause.] And it is a service so well done, so systematically done, that it would do credit to any up-to-date business establishment in the country, which is more than I can say for these other places I have been discussing.

The notification clerk now sends notice each day to every Member of the House, keeping him accurately and officially advised of the progress of legislation which the Member has introduced. Every stage of its progress from introduction to executive approval is promptly reported to the Member, and at the end of the session each Member receives from the notification clerk a complete résumé and history of all the legislation which the Member has introduced.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield for a question there?

Mr. PALMER. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman provides for a chief clerk at $3,000 a year. Did he not anticipate at the time that provision was suggested that this gentleman would hold that position?

Mr. PALMER. I did; and I stated to the caucus that I considered his service in the past so valuable, and its prospect of value so great in the future, that I felt he was a man who ought to be retained in this House, regardless of politics or political influence, unless a man can be found absolutely equal to him to perform this valuable service; and the original idea was that he should be the chief of this little bureau, and extend into all the departments of these several bill clerks the same system that has been inaugurated by him in reference to following up legislation for the information of Members.

As a further illustration of what I say, we have a man who is down here as a distributing clerk, drawing $2,400 a year or more, whose sole duty is to walk out to the document room on the day after a bill is introduced, get a printed copy of the bill, and take it to the committee to which it has been referred.

That is the work of a boy, perhaps the work of the committee to which the bill is referred. I believe each Member ought to follow his bill until it gets to the proper committee just the same as he takes it up to the basket, and whether that be so or not, the only reason why a page boy can not do the work of the distributing clerk heretofore has been upon the theory that the department must have a receipt. Our idea is that the notification clerk system can be extended, so that receipts will be returned upon the delivery of these documents. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend and revise my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether, in extending his remarks, they are to be personal to any of the employees of the House?

Mr. PALMER. Oh, no. I have not been personal so far.

Mr. MANN. I have no criticism to make of the gentleman.

Mr. PALMER. And I certainly will not be in my printed remarks.

Mr. MANN. I did not suppose the gentleman would be.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. PALMER. I have stated that it may be necessary that some of the places abolished by the pending resolution will be restored, in order to be certain that the efficient operation of the House shall not be impaired, but that such restorations or additions to other offices will not exceed $12,000 per annum, or thereabouts. I have no doubt that the force of employees still remaining after this resolution shall have gone into effect would be ample to give such efficient operation to the affairs of the House, if it were not for the fact that the change made is a sudden one, involving a reorganization in the very middle of an important session. Rather than place the majority party in the position of having crippled the management and impaired the efficiency of the House organization, I would prefer immediately to amend the pending resolution by striking out from the list of places abolished the positions to which I have heretofore referred, viz, index clerk and notification clerk and a few others, but the Committee on Accounts has deemed it best that the resolution should pass exactly as it passed the Democratic caucus. I propose therefore, and I have already so stated to the Committee on Accounts, to introduce a resolution which will restore to the rolls the following places:

Janitor to stenographers to committees	$720
Janitor for rooms of official reporters of debates	800
Index clerk	2,500
Notification clerk	2,300
Special employee (for service in connection with the work heretofore done by the force of the Clerk's document room)	1,580
Clerk in charge of pairs	1,800
Assistant bookkeeper	1,200
One clerk under the Doorkeeper	1,600

making a total of $12,500. The two janitors for the stenographers perform certain important duties in connection with the work of those stenographers, about which the investigating committee was not informed at the time that the caucus resolution was passed. The Clerk's document room having been practically wiped out by the present resolution, it is found that the Clerk does not have any employee who can take over that work, and a special employee should be provided, at a salary of $1,580, who will be able to do, with the other force of the Clerk's office, all of the work which has heretofore been done in the Clerk's document room. As to the clerk in charge of pairs, since the resolution was originally introduced the minority have filled the places heretofore used by the minority, and it is found that the majority will be short of a sufficient force to properly cooperate with the minority clerks in charge of pairs. As to the assistant bookkeeper in the Sergeant at Arms office, it is believed on further investigation that the important work of that office, when conducted by men who heretofore have had no experience in the office, will require the service of this assistant bookkeeper.

The only other position which I would propose to restore is one clerk in the office of the Doorkeeper, which is made necessary by a division of labor which has long been in force in that office, in which work it is believed that this clerk is necessary. My conclusion in regard to the restoration of these places has been reached after cooperation in an investigation made by a subcommittee of the Committee on Accounts. With these changes the system of reorganization effected by the pending resolution and the other kindred resolutions will meet with the approval of all the elective officers of the House whose subordinates are thus affected, and there will be no excuse or reason for any attempt on the part of these elective officers or anybody else interested in the organization of the House to make any change after the proposed resolution restoring these places has been passed.

The resolution, therefore, will be introduced for the purpose of definitely and finally settling all questions relating to the House for the present Congress, and I, for one, shall strenuously oppose any further effort to place any man upon the pay roll during the present Congress. After the resolution restoring these places shall have been passed, the net saving to the Treasury by reason of the reforms which will have been put in operation in the House management will amount to $228,245.26, as follows:

Net saving under the pending resolution		$82,010.00
Saving in salaries of employees of committees abolished		6,000.00
Saving in salaries of Capitol police proposed to be abolished by joint resolution		39,000.00
Saving per annum by discontinuance of the practice of appropriating extra month's salary to employees at the close of each session, based on appropriations for Sixty-first Congress		101,735.26
Total		228,745.26
From which there will be deducted after the resolution to which I have just referred, restoring several places, shall be passed	$12,500.00
		216,245.26
Add estimated saving under House Resolution 158, to be reported this day	12,000.00
		228,245.26

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I had no intention of participating in this debate and should not have done so, had not a reference been made to the employees connected with the Speaker's office of the House. The Speaker of the House, as I think I can prove by the present occupant of that position, if it needed any proof, is not lonesome for the want of something to do. In the first place, he presides over the House. The south half of the Capitol is under his control. He is responsible for the elevator men. He has charge of the press gallery. Under the rule, he refers every bill that is introduced to the appropriate committee, and when you recollect there are 30,000 bills, plus, every Congress, it can be seen at once that he can not do so. Under the rule, it is his duty to examine the Journal, and there are many other duties. The restaurant is under his charge, being in the south half of the Capitol. He is in one sense responsible for it. Now, no man can perform the duties of Speaker and do it all himself.

He has a clerk, which my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER] charged to him, called the clerk to the Speaker's table, just as though he was an employee of the Speaker. Why, he not only has charge of the Speaker's table, which requires a skilled, trained man, but he is also the parliamentarian, and the experience of this individual as Speaker found him to be a very necessary assistant to the Speaker. I recollect one day when Senator WILLIAMS, of Mississippi, was minority leader, a point of order being under consideration, and being of some importance, while somebody was talking to it, I was apparently listening and yet talking to and consulting with the parliamentarian, the clerk to the Speaker's desk. Mr. WILLIAMS, then a Representative in this House, asked, "What is the Speaker doing?" I recollect my reply was that I was consulting with the gentleman touching this point of order, a gentleman who could give cards and spades touching parliamentary points and the precedents to the gentleman from Mississippi and to the Speaker and then win.

Again, in no sense is the clerk to the Speaker's table an assistant to the Speaker except in an official capacity. In point of fact, Mr. Speaker, the Journal clerk brings the Journal to your room every morning. You do not examine it. The clerk to the Speaker's table goes over it with the Journal clerk—an act of the Speaker through somebody else. In point of fact you do not refer the bills to the committees.

The clerk to the Speaker's table does that, and when there is a great avalanche of them he gets the Journal clerk, and if he can find any other competent man about the Clerk's desk, as there are frequently, and no doubt will be again and are now, he gets them, and they come in, and it takes the whole force, exercising something of vigilance, to make the proper references. Even then there is a percentage of mistakes that has to be corrected subsequently.

Again, the private secretary, so called, to the Speaker is a pretty busy man and a very important one, first to the Speaker in the performance of his official duties, but of far greater importance to the House. There is no more important official in the House than the so-called private secretary to the Speaker.

The reporters' gallery never gave me any trouble, because I said to the private secretary, "You wrestle it out with the boys, and I will hold you responsible, but never come to me about it unless you are up a stump and have no escape." The same way with the restaurant, whether it is good, bad, or indifferent, it was unloaded on the private secretary and on the Superintendent of the Capitol very largely. My friend says it is bad. Yes, and never will be satisfactory to all of us until we try it as the Senate tried an experiment of running the restaurant at the expense of the contingent fund, so that we can have everything on tap. That was not embarked on and I apprehend will not be.

Now, then, the messenger out here at the Speaker's office. He is not the Speaker's messenger, he is a messenger quite as important to the comfort of the House and the whole country as any messenger in the employ of the United States anywhere. Then there is a parliamentary clerk, the reading clerks, the Journal clerk, tally clerk, and so forth, and, in addition, there is a messenger to the Speaker's table. He was not there until Gen. Henderson's time as Speaker when the House thought it was necessary, and I found the messenger to the Speaker's table to be a very important man, because here is a great membership, much of confusion, and you have got to have these assistants in the administration of the second office of the Government. Now, then, touching this assistant stenographer to committees. When I became Speaker I found him there; that he had been an employee. His designation was assistant to the committee stenographers. So far as I know, he never did any work of that kind. He was utilized by Gen. Henderson when Speaker, and I am inclined to think by Speaker Reed as Speaker, in connection with the duties of the private secretary. He might be called a stenographer to the private secretary, who used him more than anybody else, but he was a very useful man.

I have no apologies to make during a Speakership of eight years for this corps of assistants really performing the public business for the House, because no Speaker can perform one-half of these details if he could work 24 hours in a day and more industriously than I ever was or ever will be. I want to say that, in my judgment, from the standpoint of compensation the salary of a Member of Congress at $7,500 will not bring a fortune. I have been in Congress almost 38 years, at $5,000 salary, at $7,500, and I believe for the last five years, up to the 4th of March, I will not be quite sure, at $12,000 a year. I was not compelled to be Speaker, I am not compelled to be a Member of Congress, and I want to say I am not an extravagant man. To say nothing about the Illinois home and expenditures and education of children, I want to say to you that my salary in all that time has not paid one-third of the expenditures. How could you afford to stay? I made this statement once to a constituent, who was finding fault with me——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CANNON. May I have two or three minutes more?

Mr. LLOYD. I yield three minutes more to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CANNON. The reply was and is that fortunately for me when I came into Congress I owned some of this black land in Illinois, the best in the world. I had a little property that I was fortunate enough to have accumulated, and by a business that was then organized, there never has been a year but what my income with my salary added has not come out even with the expenditures, with something to the good; otherwise I never would have stayed here a single day. Now that is my experience. I have no apology to make for utilizing this employee. He was utilized not for my benefit, but for the interest of the public service, and if the present Speaker of the House does not utilize him, or at least some one, he must have very good assistants, because such an employee or some one, you may call him what name you may, is necessary for the proper conduct of that great office. [Applause.]

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of economy in the service of the House, and am opposed to the creation or maintenance of any useless offices or officers. I recall, for instance, when the first proposition came into the House for policemen in the Office Building, that it was a proposition for 35 men, I believe, with a unanimous recommendation from the committee which reported it. It was I who called attention to the uselessness of that number of policemen in the Office Building, and then I offered a proposition to reduce the number, I think, to 10. But the question of the number of policemen is one thing. We can get along with a fewer or a greater number without any appreciable knowledge on our part, but the question of the transaction of the public business by the House is quite a different thing.

I am quite content that the majority of the House shall endeavor to carry on the public business in such manner as it desires, leaving it to learn by experience and to acquire wisdom by actual knowledge. The gentlemen who have talked upon this resolution, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER] did, entertainingly and instructively, have based their statements largely upon conditions now existing in this House. We have been in session a little more than a month, and have passed a few bills and resolutions through the House. We have none on the calendar, with the exception of three or four. We have transacted no business, so far as number of bills is concerned, and gentlemen who consider the situation now, with very little business going on at the desk, and consider business in the House when bills are flying back and forth between the House and the Senate, and conference reports are being made, will find that there is a great deal of difference between having a small number of unskilled men at the desk and a sufficient number of skilled men to transact the business of the House.

Why, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER] refers to the Journal clerk. The Journal clerk never was a stenographer until the last Journal clerk, I may say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and the Journal clerk has always had an assistant. The time will come during this Congress when the Journal clerk will find, if he attends to his business, that it will be necessary for him to leave the Hall of the House in order to commence to make up his Journal, perhaps during some all-night session, and when he does there must be an assistant Journal clerk to take his place.

But the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and other gentlemen on that side of the House, evidently think they can supply a Journal clerk who can be bodily present at the Clerk's desk for perhaps 24 hours in succession, and at the same time be in the Journal clerk's room preparing the Journal. And they can not call in a raw recruit to do the work of the Journal clerk at the desk. Every paper that comes from the Senate, every document that comes into the House of that character, every conference report, goes into the hands of the Journal clerk, and must be taken care of by a Journal clerk who knows what they are and what they mean, and what the proceedings mean. The present Journal clerk may believe that he has had experience as a Journal clerk. Why, I would have no difficulty in writing the Journal up to date in this Congress. I think few men on the floor of the House would have any difficulty in preparing any Journal that we have had yet prepared for us. The Journal clerk has prepared the Journal well. I believe that he is a competent man to prepare it in the future, but the preparation of the Journal up to date is mere child's play compared with a giant's work when it comes to really taking care of the Journal in the days when the House is really doing business.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. MANN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. PALMER. Does not the gentleman believe that, with a force of a chief bill clerk and four assistants, and a stenographer charged with the duty of assisting the Journal clerk, all that work can be taken care of in busy times? In other words, is it not a fact that the Journal clerk's busy time is at the end of a session while these various bill clerks' busy time is at the beginning of a session?

Mr. MANN. Not at all. I will not say they can not take care of it, but the latter statement is not correct. The Journal clerk is busy whenever Congress really commences to do business and bills commence to be passed.

Now, I have heard a number of felicitations on the number of bills passed on that side of the House. In the last Congress we passed—not merely reported and had on the calendar for consideration, but passed—810 laws. That means several a day. There were 525 public laws, 285 private acts, and besides those, a considerable number of joint resolutions, current resolutions, and House resolutions.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, are not the gentleman's figures too low? The gentleman means, doubtless, the last session, not the last Congress.

Mr. MANN. No; I mean the last Congress.

Mr. SIMS. The report I have as to the number of bills passed in the last Congress exceeds that. I get my information from official sources.

Mr. MANN. I do not see how the gentleman could have gotten his information from any official source. I had to go to the document room the other day in search of this information, and there is no official souree from which the information can be taken except the calendar. That is the only official source.

Mr. SIMS. There were more private pension bills passed than that.

Mr. MANN. Oh, Mr. Speaker, at one time, in one Congress, the Fifty-ninth Congress, there were 6,940 bills passed, of which 6,248 were private bills. We pass as many private bills now in the form of omnibus bills as we did then, and they receive the same consideration now that they did then. But they do not count in the total number of laws passed.

Mr. SIMS. But they are included in the work that is necessary to be done.

Mr. MANN. That is true. But I was speaking of the number of laws that were passed. Now, a large number of these laws that pass go to the Senate and come back again. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER] is, I believe, an exceedingly bright man, but he never yet has had the responsibility of being in control of a bill in the House and following it, and he will find when he comes to that control that there is a great deal of care and responsibility resting upon the Journal clerk, who can not be some greenhorn who does not know exactly what to do. Members know that not a day passes when the House is in session that Members on that side of the House do not go to the Journal clerk and the reading clerks for information as to what to do and how to do it.

Matters as to conference reports, items in conference, and all sorts of questions arise in the disposition of papers. What the gentleman says now is very much like what the gentleman stated a little while ago as to a page boy being able to make deliveries to committees. Would the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER] have a page boy take possession of a conference report or a bill that has been sent to conference and have him carry it to the committee in charge of it? There being but one copy, when the Senate engrossed bill is sent to the House would the gentleman have it intrusted to a page boy to be delivered? Under the existing rule the distributing clerk takes it and signs a receipt, and the engrossed bill is guarded as carefully as money is guarded at the Treasury Department.

Mr. PALMER. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. PALMER. The gentleman has referred to the duties of the Journal clerk and his usefulness in giving information to Members as to the proper course to pursue. Is it not a fact that we maintain as an officer of the House, not merely as an assistant to the Speaker, a parliamentary clerk, at a salary of $3,600 a year, whose duty it is to assist Members in that kind of fashion?

Mr. MANN. I do not think that is his duty, although I have no doubt he is always glad to give information.

Mr. PALMER. It is just as much his duty as it is the duty of the Journal clerk and his assistants.

Mr. MANN. I am not saying it is the duty of the Journal clerk to do it.

Mr. PALMER. The gentleman is seeking to justify the retention of these officers because of that duty which the parliamentary clerk is being paid to perform.

Mr. MANN. The parliamentary clerk will have his hands full when we get a chance at him at the next session of Congress, and we will keep him very busy attending to the duties of his office. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. PALMER. We shall not mind that. We propose hereafter that every man who draws a salary under the Government shall be kept busy. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. I am just waiting to see how many of you will be kept busy. You have not been kept busy yet.

Mr. JAMES. But we are keeping the gentleman busy. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. I admit the statement of the gentleman from Kentucky that they mean to keep me busy, but they have not had an opportunity yet to get busy. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. I would be glad to have a little more time.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I regret to say that, in order to yield the time that I now want to yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], I would like to have an extension of time for 15 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri desires an extension of time for 15 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes of that time to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. If I am going to have only 10 minutes, Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to have it all occupied by somebody else, although I am perfectly willing to answer questions.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Why not have plenty of time on this matter? It is an important matter.

Mr. MANN. Oh, the gentleman from Missouri has been very liberal in his allotment of the time.

This resolution provides, as stated in the report, for a net saving of $82,010. I hope there will be such a saving. This is, so far as I know, the only resolution which has yet been presented to the House which provides for any saving in employees.

Mr. CARLIN. The gentleman is mistaken. Resolution 158 is now pending.

Mr. MANN. The only resolution which has been presented.

Mr. LLOYD. Immediately following will be House joint resolution 75.

Mr. MANN. Yes; that is a House joint resolution abolishing some of the police officers. I will have a word to say about that.

Mr. CARLIN. Abolishing a number of janitors, and so forth.

Mr. MANN. Very well. I can not keep track of them all. The gentleman refers to janitors. I have been very much amused here recently to notice in the corridors of the House certain very nice looking white southern gentlemen sitting at their committee room doors as janitors. Usually, and I think always since I have been in the House, these places have been filled by colored men. I understand now that there may be some reason for abolishing janitors, because that affects the feelings of some of these white gentlemen, to be called janitors. They prefer to be called messengers. I suppose that is the reason for the resolution. However, I suppose this resolution is to be followed by one abolishing the police. That is a House joint resolution. Everyone knows what will become of that. It will die in the Senate. There is an easy way of abolishing police at this end of the Capitol. Direct the man in charge to discharge them. They will go. There is no difficulty about that. It is a good deal like the talk about doing away with the extra month's salary. What will happen? Everyone in the House knows, and the country ought to know, what will happen. We will pass a deficiency bill in the House which will contain no reference to an extra month's salary when it is brought into the House, and will contain no reference to an extra month's salary when it goes out of the House.

But that will be added in the distinguished body at the other end of the Capitol, and it will come back here and be disagreed to by the House, and then the House employees, appointed by the various Members on the majority side of the House, will go to their Members and tell them how the Member has mileage with which to go home, but the employee has no money with which to go home unless the Member furnishes him a loan.

Mr. SABATH. That is when the House is Republican.

Mr. MANN. When the bill is signed it will contain an item providing for the payment of an extra month's salary to both the House and Senate employees, agreed to by the Democratic majority in the House.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman is quite a prophet.

Mr. MANN. It does not take a prophet to know that. The gentleman from Texas and the rest of us know it.

But I am for the economy, notwithstanding I have suffered already from the effects of Democratic economy. The gentlemen on that side of the House have been very kind to me. They have provided the minority conference chairman with a very good committee room. The room I occupy has a very pretty red carpet upon it. I am not as fortunate as some of the committees that have janitors, because no janitor is furnished to take care of my room, and when I made a request the other day for a carpet sweeper in order that I might more easily clean my room, or have my clerks clean my pretty red carpet, this distinguished aggregation of economists over there turned it down. I suppose they did not know what it meant. [Laughter.] Some man on that side of the House said, "A carpet sweeper! What on earth does anyone need of a carpet sweeper." And so the carpet sweeper went. Now we do the best we can with an old-fashioned broom, stirring up the dust——

Mr. CARLIN. I want to correct the gentleman. I am sure he does not want to make a misstatement.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Virginia?

Mr. MANN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CARLIN. I want to say to the gentleman that the Committee on Accounts approved his requisition for the carpet sweeper and did not disapprove it, as he has stated.

Mr. MANN. And I want to say to the gentleman that the Committee on Accounts disapproved the requisition for the carpet sweeper, and we have not got it.

Mr. CARLIN. The gentleman is mistaken. It was approved, and every requisition the gentleman has made has been approved. Not one single thing the gentleman has asked for has been refused. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. Oh, it is easy to applaud. All I can say is that we made the requisition for the carpet sweeper and were informed that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. CARLIN], who just now addressed the House, passed upon it and struck out the carpet sweeper, although that requisition went in six weeks ago.

Mr. CARLIN. The gentleman has been misinformed——

Mr. MANN. Well, we have not got the carpet sweeper.

Mr. CARLIN. The gentleman has been misinformed. It is like a good deal of other information that the gentleman has—misinformation.

Mr. MANN. I hope so. I would like to see the carpet sweeper.

Mr. CARLIN. Well, he will get the carpet sweeper.

Mr. MANN. How long does it take to get a carpet sweeper from the Committee on Accounts?

Mr. CARLIN. I do not know. The requisition was approved.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman will find that he disapproved it. Probably he did not know what it meant.

Mr. CARLIN. It has been suggested that the gentleman ought to have asked for a vacuum cleaner.

Mr. MANN. Well, if I had I would not require the assistance of the gentleman from Virginia to furnish the air.

This resolution, Mr. Speaker, by the way, proposes to do a few things which would almost seem ludicrous. You propose to repeal the statute law by this resolution in reference to unbound documents. The statute requires that the Clerk shall have charge of them. You propose to put that in charge of the Doorkeeper. Then, I would ask the gentleman in charge of the bill, whether he will agree to an amendment to this resolution which will make it effective? The resolution now declares that certain offices shall be vacant on and after May 1. I suppose the date will be changed.

Mr. LLOYD. May 15 is the date in the proposed amendment.

Mr. MANN. How do these items in the legislative appropriation bill get into that bill? Not, as the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. FLOYD] stated, because of the constitutional power of the House to provide such officers as it pleased, without regard to appropriations or the Senate, but because under the practice of the House and the rulings which have been made from time to time, it has been held that if the House passes a simple resolution providing for the employment of any person, to be paid out of the contingent fund, that is a sufficient warrant of law to authorize the incorporation of that office and a salary for it in the legislative appropriation bill. If that be the case, then it is a sufficient warrant of law, by the House passing a resolution abolishing a place, to provide that it shall not be in order upon the legislative appropriation bill.

Mr. GARNER rose.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman from Texas will let me state my case, and then I will yield to him. Now, this resolution only declares these offices vacant. It does not dispense with or dispose of the resolutions under which they were put in the legislative appropriation bill.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. MANN. Unless this resolution is amended to abolish the offices——

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. LLOYD. There is a committee amendment the gentleman will find at the bottom of the page, line 14, which provides that the said enumerated offices are hereby abolished as offices of the House of Representatives.

Mr. MANN. I am glad of that. I have sent for a number of copies of this resolution, but no copy that I had received had that in it.

Mr. GARNER. I wanted to call the gentleman's attention to that fact before he exerted himself.

Mr. MANN. Oh, the gentleman ought to be willing to do it, for I gave the gentleman the language——

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman did, but he did not do me the courtesy to yield to me before he exhausted himself.

Mr. MANN. I am glad to know the gentlemen have incorporated a provision in abolishing the offices so that those which are not necessary will not be filled. Now, I will say to gentlemen on that side of the House in all good faith I appreciate their desire to economize in the employees of the House, and if they have overstepped the mark—and I think likely they have—and in the future when Congress is in session it develops that they need more employees with which to properly transact the business of the House, I hope that they will not be afraid to come into the House and state the facts and needs and ask for the employees. After all, before the country the question of saving $100,000 or $200,000 in the House is a very little moment. A few minutes ago the gentleman from Pennsylvania referred to the number of officials in the Speaker's room. Well, conditions differ. The Speaker of the House used to occupy a little room here at the end of this first corridor before you get to the large corridor——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. LLOYD. I yield two minutes additional to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. The Speaker was moved out of that room and moved into the room which he now occupies on the southeast corner of the building. That is all that Speaker CANNON had at any time. At the last session I introduced a resolution, which was passed, to give to the Speaker an addition of two rooms downstairs opposite the restaurant. I think it is perfectly proper that he should have them; he needs them. He has more space than any Speaker has ever had before. No Speaker in the history of the Government has ever had as much space in the Capitol as the present Speaker has, and that is no criticism against him.

Mr. SABATH. But he is a much bigger man——

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. He is a much bigger——

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. Well, I have no doubt that that is as near to the point the gentleman from New Jersey or my colleague from Illinois will ever get. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. That satisfies me.

Mr. MANN. Well, very little satisfies the gentleman from New Jersey. Since yesterday, when he voted against the proposition to exclude convict labor and against the proposition to exclude articles which were not made under the eight-hour law, I think he will be very easily satisfied hereafter.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. I vote against any proposition pretending to benefit labor coming from the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. Well, the gentleman from New Jersey was very glad to have the gentleman from Illinois in the chair rule his proposition in order in reference to the eight-hour labor law.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. The gentleman never did; I will call his attention to——

Mr. MANN. The gentleman ought to confine himself to the fact——

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. I am confining myself to the fact when I said the gentleman from Illinois never ruled the eight-hour proposition in order to my recollection, but, on the contrary, bitterly protested against my——

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman's recollection is no better than that, it is extremely bad.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution and amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Chair wishes to call the attention of the gentleman from Missouri to the fact that when the resolution was read this morning the original resolution was read and the amended resolution was not.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent, then, that——

Mr. MANN. That is because we have green and inexperienced reading clerks.

Mr. GARNER. No; I do not think that is the cause, but——

Mr. LLOYD. Just on that, if my friend will pardon me in making this statement——

The SPEAKER. But the previous question is ordered.

Mr. LLOYD. Then I shall offer the amendment from the floor, and that is, in line 14, House resolution 128, committee print, at the bottom——

Mr. MANN. The gentleman can ask unanimous consent; I think nobody will object to it.

Mr. LLOYD. The word "first" is to be changed to "fifteenth," and following the word "eleven," in line 14, and at the top of page 2, lines 1 and 2, insert these words, "and the said enumerated offices"——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order the previous question has been ordered.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that these be considered as committee amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the amendments suggested by him be considered as committee amendments. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. It is a very good illustration of the need of experienced men at the desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 14, strike out the word "first" and insert the word "fifteen."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 14, after the word "eleven," insert "and the said enumerated offices"——

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I am not sure, but I do not think the Clerk has the right bill.

The SPEAKER. He has the committee print. The Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 14, after the word "eleven," insert:
"And the said enumerated offices are hereby abolished as offices of the House of Representatives."

Mr. LLOYD. That is correct.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, lines 17 and 18, strike out the word "first" and insert the word "fifteen."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the resolution as amended.

The question was taken, and the resolution as amended was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. LLOYD, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution as amended was agreed to was laid on the table.

INVESTIGATION OF POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT AND SERVICE.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House resolution 109.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHBROOK] asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the resolution.

During the reading,

Mr. ASHBROOK said: Mr. Speaker, I believe the Clerk is not reading the substitute as reported.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask my colleague [Mr. ASHBROOK] if it is possible to procure a copy?

Mr. MANN. A minority employee was sent out to get some.

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk again proceeded with the reading of the resolution.

During the reading,

Mr. MANN said: Mr. Speaker, I suggest to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHBROOK] that he ask unanimous consent to read the substitute.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, on the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], I ask unanimous consent to read the substitute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHBROOK] asks unanimous consent to dispense with the further reading of the original resolution, and that the substitute be read. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Expenditures in the Post Office Department be, and the same is hereby, directed to institute and carry forward an investigation into the conduct and administration of the affairs of the Post Office Department, and of the service under and in connection with the same, in order to ascertain whether abuses exist, either in the department or in the service to the prejudice of the public welfare.

The committee may inquire into and ascertain the amount of work done by the postmasters, officials, and employees in the department and in the service, the number of hours devoted by such officials, postmasters, and employees to their work, and whether the number of officials and employees may be reduced without detriment to the public interests.

The committee may further inquire as to the time devoted by postmasters to private enterprise and personal vocations to the detriment of the public service. They may inquire into and ascertain the extent to which such postmasters, officials, and employees participate in political campaigns, make political addresses, and serve as active members of political organizations.

The committee may further inquire into and report to what degree the public interests and the reasonable wishes of the communities affected have been disregarded in the establishment, removal, and discontinuance of post offices, and the appointment of postmasters under what is known as the referee system and other systems adopted by the department.

The committee may ascertain and report the extent to which postmasters and their employees have contributed to the expense of political campaigns, and whether these contributions were voluntary or enforced.

The committee shall further make such recommendations as to reforms in methods and procedure in the department under investigation as may be justified by the evidence taken and as will effect economy and promote efficiency in the future administration of its affairs.

Said committee or any subcommittee of the same is empowered to sit and act at any time and place. Authority to administer oaths is conferred upon the chairman of the committee or any member thereof. The committee, or any subcommittee appointed by the chairman to take evidence for the full committee, is empowered to take testimony under oath, to obtain documents, papers, and other information from the Post Office Department, or any bureau or official thereof, and to require the attendance of witnesses and the production of papers, by subpœna, to be signed by the chairman of the full committee or the chairman of any subcommittee, in the prosecution of its work.

The committee is further empowered to employ, from time to time, such stenographers as may be necessary to take, and make a record of all of the evidence received by the committee, and to keep a record of its proceedings. That the Sergeant at Arms of the House is directed to attend in person or by assistant, when requested, the sessions of the full committee or any subcommittee thereof, to serve all of the subpœnas put into his hands, pay the fees of all witnesses, and the necessary expenses of the committee. The cost and expense of this investigation shall be paid from the contingent fund of the House of Representatives.

All hearings by said committee or any subcommittee thereof shall be open to the public.

The committee shall report to this Congress all evidence taken, and their findings and conclusions thereon.

No witness shall be excused from testifying or producing any documents respecting which he shall be examined, on the ground that his testimony to such facts or the production of such papers may tend to disgrace him; but no testimony that he shall give shall be used as evidence against him in any criminal proceedings in any court, except upon a prosecution for perjury committed in giving such testimony.

The committee may file its report and accompanying documents with the Clerk of the House during the recess of Congress.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHBROOK] asks unanimous consent for the consideration of the resolution. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to inquire first, if I may, from the Speaker whether it is to be the policy of the Speaker to recognize Members for unanimous consent for ordinary resolutions on days other than unanimous-consent days, or whether the recognition is given in this case because it is a matter relating to the committees of the House?

The SPEAKER. The latter statement is the reason for it. The Chair will pursue until directed by the House the same routine and policy that has been pursued heretofore as to unanimous recognition.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHBROOK] whether he considers the paragraph at the bottom of page 7 means anything whatever? The paragraph proposes to legislate, in this simple resolution, as to the commission of perjury when testifying before a committee. What authority has this House by simple resolution to enact law?

Mr. ASHBROOK. I would say to the gentleman from Illinois that this resolution was prepared by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS], who is a good parliamentarian and an able lawyer, and I will yield to him in order that he may answer the question.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois, in response to his question, that that portion of the resolution to which he refers does not give any more power to the committee than it already enjoys under existing law.

Mr. MANN. That is a copy of the existing law, I should say.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Then what is the purpose of putting it in the resolution?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Heretofore it has been the practice to draw resolutions of this character in this form. That is one reason, and the other reason for inserting these provisions of existing law was in order that it might be available for the information of the committee. The gentleman from Illinois will remember that he was concerned in the preparation of the resolution which related to the investigation of Indian contracts. That resolution contained a provision similar to the one now under discussion.

Mr. MANN. I will say to the gentleman that I was concerned only in seeing that the gentleman from Virginia was placed on that committee, where I will say that he rendered efficient and valuable service.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I said the gentleman had something to do with the preparation of that resolution on the floor.

Mr. MANN. The only thing I had to do with it was to suggest that the gentleman from Virginia, who is now on the floor, be placed on that committee.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I am very much obliged to the gentleman from Illinois for his action in that respect. As I said before, this portion of the resolution does not give any more power to the committee than it would enjoy under the general laws. It simply states the law in concrete form, and renders it available for the committee, showing them what powers they will possess. It is the common practice to include such a provision in a resolution of this character.

Mr. MANN. I can see no reason for putting it in except to inform whoever is on this committee what the law now is.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I stated before that that was one of the reasons it was inserted.

Mr. MANN. It is to be supposed that the Members of the committee already know it.

Mr. SAUNDERS. As I said, it simply makes the law available for the information of the members of the committee.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield to the gentleman from South Dakota?

Mr. ASHBROOK. Yes.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman in charge of this resolution a question. I notice that the resolution provides that the expenses of the investigation shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House. I notice also that the resolution numbered 148, which passed the House this morning, confers upon the committee that it is proposed to create substantially the same powers that are given to this committee in the pending resolution, but in that resolution there is no provision made for paying the expenses of the investigation. I desire to know what the intention is on that side of the House with respect to providing for the expenses of these several investigations. Is it expected that there will be a resolution introduced at a future time to provide for the expenses of the committee appointed under House resolution 148? And why do you provide in one case how the expenses shall be paid and in the other case omit any reference whatever to the matter of expenses?

Mr. ASHBROOK. I will say to the gentleman that it is not anticipated that the expenses of this investigating committee will be great. But in all probability there will be some expenses in the way of conducting these investigations.

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the gentleman yield to me so that I may answer the question of the gentleman from South Dakota?

Mr. ASHBROOK. Certainly.

Mr. HARDWICK. Answering the question of the gentleman from South Dakota, Mr. Speaker, I will say that the reason why the provision for the payment of the expenses of the investigating committee referred to by the gentleman was not included was because the resolution acted upon this morning was presented as a matter of privilege, and it destroys the privileged character of a resolution to include in it the proposition that the expenses of the committee shall be paid from the contingent fund, for the reason that under the rules of the House any proposition relating to the expenditure of the contingent fund must be referred to the Committee on Accounts and be reported from that committee.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Will the gentleman from Georgia tell us how it is expected to provide for those expenses?

Mr. HARDWICK. By a report from the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I would like to ask the gentleman in charge of this resolution if it would not be possible to spend a very large sum of money instead of a small amount?

Mr. ASHBROOK. I presume it would be possible for this committee to expend a very considerable sum of money, but——

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I simply mention that because it strikes me that there ought to be some uniformity in these resolutions with respect to the provision for the payment of expenses.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I can answer the question of the gentleman from South Dakota as to the reason why this provision was included in this particular resolution. It is because it was done in the case of other resolutions providing for investigations. I have simply followed the precedents of the House.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I will say to the gentleman from Virginia that I would have raised no question had it not been for the fact that on this day we passed another similar resolution without any such provision in it.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes; I noted that at the time.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. And there is no use in creating a committee to investigate unless you make provision to pay the expenses of the committee.

Mr. MANN. All these things ought to come from the Committee on Accounts. Will the gentleman yield for a further question?

Mr. ASHBROOK. Yes; I will.

Mr. MANN. I notice that this resolution authorizes the committee to employ from time to time such stenographers as may be necessary to take and make a record of the evidence received by the committee. The gentleman is aware that we maintain a number of committee stenographers, at an expense of $5,000 a year each, and that the committees are not very busy at present. Just what reason is there for not using the committee stenographers who are permanently employed, instead of employing outside stenographers to do this work, at additional expense?

Mr. ASHBROOK. That question was discussed in detail in committee, and it is the intention of the committee to use the committee stenographers, and this provision was put in the resolution for the reason that there may come a time when the committee stenographers will be otherwise employed, and we can then employ outside help; but I will say to the gentleman that no extra stenographers will be employed whenever it is possible to secure the services of those provided by the House.

Mr. MANN. But the gentleman understands that under the law now, if he makes a request for the services of one of the official committee stenographers and they can not attend personally, they send him an outside stenographer, who is paid out of the contingent fund. Every chairman of a committee frequently O. K.'s bills of outside stenographers, under the law, whenever the committee stenographers are engaged. The committee stenographers telephone downtown, or some other place, and have some one here to do the work.

I should like to ask the gentleman, in that connection, whether it is intended that this committee shall travel around the country——

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order. This is an important matter, relating to the taking of money out of the Public Treasury, and Members ought to be permitted to hear it.

Mr. MANN. I desire to ask the gentleman whether it is the intention of the committee to travel around the country and to go to places where they could not very well take one of the regular committee stenographers away from his duties here.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes; that is in contemplation.

Mr. ASHBROOK. I will say to the gentleman that it is not unlikely that this committee will have some hearings at other places than here in Washington.

Mr. MANN. Junketing trips.

Mr. ASHBROOK. In that case we would certainly be compelled to employ a stenographer; but there will be no junketing. On the contrary, much hard work.

Mr. MANN. And of course the committee will have their railroad expenses and hotel bills paid?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Of course. That is provided for in the resolution.

Mr. MANN. Yes; even if they take a trip to California.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Gentlemen are commencing early on that side of the House to provide junketing trips.

Mr. ASHBROOK. I do not think they will take any trips of that kind; and if the resolution is passed, whenever and wherever we make investigations I will be very glad if the gentleman from Illinois will examine the expense account of the committee.

Mr. MANN. I will not have the opportunity, and would not have if I had the time.

Mr. ASHBROOK. The gentleman seems to have time to do everything that he wants to do. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. I do not want to be put in the position where I have got to examine petty expense accounts, and I do not expect to be put in that position. This is a matter of unanimous consent. I have no objection whatever to an investigation of the Post Office Department, or to the payment of proper expenses in connection with the investigation.

But I am not quite sure how far we ought to start now in the creation of junketing trips, which always have been popular at this time of the year in Washington.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Ohio for some information. I want to ask the gentleman if he considers the scope of this resolution sufficiently broad to enable the committee to investigate the effect upon the service in the Post Office Department of the executive orders of President Roosevelt preventing the employees from petitioning Congress for redress of grievances and the executive order of President Taft prohibiting the employees in the Post Office Department and other departments from giving information relative to the service to Members of Congress, of either House, and the order issued by the Second Assistant Postmaster General prohibiting employees in the railway mail service from joining certain labor organizations.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, I would say to the gentleman that that matter has been discussed somewhat in the committee, but we were of the opinion that that belongs to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service.

Mr. KENDALL. Mr. Speaker, we were not able to hear the answer of the gentleman from Ohio to the question of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order. The Chair would like to suggest to the gentlemen that if they would all speak a little louder we could all hear. The Chair is interested in the debate and would like to hear.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Speaker, I would like to hear the reply of the gentleman from Ohio to the question of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, I would say to the gentlemen that I informed the gentleman from Pennsylvania that it had been the opinion of the Committee on Expenditures in the Post Office Department that the matter to which the gentleman refers properly belongs to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service.

Mr. CARTER. And the investigation is being conducted now, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I wish to make this statement in connection, in addition to the statement already made by the chairman of the committee, if he will yield.

Mr. ASHBROOK. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN] and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SLEMP], who are members of this committee, and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER], all agreed, I think, in committee that there was no occasion for us to investigate the questions that are raised by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILSON]. That question is already being investigated by the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, and we have no disposition whatever to go into that question at all.

Mr. KENDALL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. ASHBROOK. I yield for a question.

Mr. KENDALL. I want to ascertain, if I can, whether the powers conferred upon this committee which is about to be created would include authority to investigate the controversy which has been pending for a long time between the Government and what is known as the Lewis Publishing Co., at St. Louis.

Mr. ASHBROOK. I believe that it would.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes; it would cover that.

Mr. KENDALL. That is a disagreement between the Government and the company in which a great many very excellent people have a keen interest, and they believe that the Government's action toward the company has been arbitrary and unjust; and if this authority is not sufficiently broad to include the power to investigate this difficulty I think this resolution ought to be amended.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I will say to the gentleman that it is amply broad to cover that particular inquiry.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. On page 6 of the substitute I find the following language:

> The committee may further inquire into and report to what degree the public interest and the reasonable wishes of the communities affected have been disregarded in the establishment, removal, and discontinuance of post offices.

Now, there is no provision in this substitute in relation to the star routes, and why did you leave that out?

Mr. SAUNDERS. It is embraced in the provisions——

Mr. RAKER. Where is it embraced in the provisions? I can not find it.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit, the answer to all of these inquiries is contained in very plain English in the first clause of the resolution, and anybody who will read that will find this fact stated——

Mr. KENDALL. I think we all have read it, but not with the great degree of intelligence of the gentleman——

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I have the floor, and I did not yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio has the floor.

Mr. RAKER. I have the floor; I understood the gentleman from Ohio to yield to me for a question.

Mr. ASHBROOK. I yielded to the gentleman from California.

Mr. RAKER. That is my understanding, and under that yielding I will occupy the floor until the Speaker calls me out of order.

Mr. ASHBROOK. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. RAKER. Now, if that is the condition that the first provision contains all the authority, why have these special provisions been put in the rest of the bill? We are interested in the star routes in the West, and within the last six months there have been over 50 discontinued in my district, and that applies to all the people who live in the mines and on the farms who should be entitled to have their mail. Instead of having it a weekly service, they have been cut down to one a week, and instead of having it seven times a week, they have been cut down to twice a week. Now, I want to know why this has been done, and whether or not this resolution specifies sufficiently to have that matter investigated.

Mr. ASHBROOK. I will say to the gentleman we did not consider it necessary to enumerate all of the abuses, and, as has been stated by the gentleman from Kentucky, the first section is broad enough to investigate star routes and almost any other cases.

Mr. RAKER. If you specify some, I feel as though some of these star-route matters ought to be in, because we are specially interested in them and want the service.

Mr. ASHBROOK. I will say to the gentleman——

Mr. RAKER. Would the gentleman have any objection to this amendment added after——

The SPEAKER. The Chair wishes to state that all of this debate is by unanimous consent.

Mr. RAKER. I so understand, but nobody has interrupted me by objecting.

The SPEAKER. But the Chair wanted the rest of the Members to understand it.

Mr. CARLIN. Regular order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MANN. Regular order amounts to an objection.

Mr. CARLIN. I withdraw the request for regular order if it amounts to an objection.

The SPEAKER. Regular order amounts to an objection.

Mr. CARLIN. I will withdraw the demand for the regular order.

Mr. RAKER. I would like to ask the gentleman from Ohio if he would not permit an amendment at the end of line 4 by adding the following, "and the reduction and the curtailment of services on star routes."

Mr. ASHBROOK. I will say to the gentleman we have no objection to his amendment——

Mr. RAKER. Very well.

Mr. ALEXANDER. No; we will not consent to it; it is absolutely unnecessary.

Mr. ASHBROOK. I do not think it is necessary, but I do not see any serious objection to it. I think the gentleman will be satisfied with the results of the investigation had.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield for this question? Then the understanding is that when this investigation is made it will cover the star routes as well?

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will read the first section he will see that it is broad enough to include it.

Mr. RAKER. I would like to have a direct answer to that so my people will know whether or not their interests are going to be protected, but there seems to be no question from the statement of the chairman as to that fact.

Mr. ASHBROOK. I will say to the gentleman this resolution is broad enough to embrace this investigation; and if, in the wisdom of the committee, we believe it advisable, undoubtedly it will be had.

Mr. RAKER. That answers the question.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHBROOK].

Mr. MURDOCK. Is it the intention of the committee, if the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHBROOK] will yield to me, to go into the matter of rural free delivery under this resolution?

Mr. ASHBROOK. I will say to the gentleman from Kansas that this committee has not determined just what particular branches it will take up.

Mr. MURDOCK. Does the gentleman believe that the resolution is broad enough to allow the committee to go into the matter of rural free delivery?

Mr. ASHBROOK. I certainly do. It says:

> In order to ascertain whether abuses exist either in the department or in the service to the prejudice of public welfare.

That would certainly include the point to which the gentleman refers.

Mr. MURDOCK. I did not see it specifically mentioned, and I wanted the opinion of the gentleman on the proposition.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask a question. If there is no objection to this resolution being taken up for consideration, is it the intention of the chairman of the committee to allow amendments to be offered or simply to ask for the previous question? I have an amendment I would like to offer.

Mr. ASHBROOK. I would be glad to have it read.

Mr. HILL. I have no objection to its being read now and to leave it pending.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Read for information.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the amendment, for information only.

The Clerk read as follows:

> On page 7, at the end of line 14, add:
> "And a detailed statement of expenses so incurred shall accompany and be a part of the committee report."

Mr. ASHBROOK. I would say to the gentleman that I would be perfectly willing to accept the amendment.

Mr. HILL. Just one word. I am not opposed to any of these investigations. I encourage them rather than otherwise. But we are going into a very broad field, not only in the Post Office case, but in a great many other cases, and it strikes me that the House of Representatives and the American people have the right to know what the expenditures are, and that in each case the expenses should accompany the report and not be buried in the archives of the House, where they never will be seen. Now, the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department have just ordered—and I voted for it—the expenses of the Monetary Commission to be presented in detail to the committee, and I think by far the wisest way is to have those expenditures reported with the report of the committee, showing just exactly what it cost, and if the gentleman will accept that amendment I have no objection to his resolution.

Mr. ASHBROOK. I fully agree with the gentleman and will cheerfully accept the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio can not accept the amendment. The House will have to vote on it. Of course, he could give his assurance to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] that he is willing to accept it.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw any objection, on the assurance of the Chair.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Ohio if he has any idea of what the expenses of this investigation would be?

Mr. HILL. Nobody can tell.

Mr. ASHBROOK. I will say to the gentleman I have no idea as to what the expenses will be, but I think the members of the Committee on Expenditures in the Post Office Department are all in favor of economy, and they will appreciate that it will be a very poor showing on our part to undertake to investigate this department for the purpose of effecting economy and then bring in a large expense account. My notion is that it will be very small.

Mr. OLMSTED. Would the gentleman be willing to provide, then, in the resolution a limitation upon the expense, say, of $50,000?

Mr. ASHBROOK. I do not think it will amount to that much. We will be perfectly willing to accept the amount at $50,000, but I do not believe it will amount to that.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman if the resolution is broad enough in its scope to permit the committee to investigate as to the sanitary conditions under which the postal employees are working. I ask this question for the reason that, according to the reports of the health department of Chicago, the conditions under which the Chicago post-office employees are working are resulting in tuberculosis and other diseases, causing in some cases death of the employees there.

Mr. ASHBROOK. I will say to the gentleman that I am in sympathy with the suggestion he makes, and the committee, in my opinion, will be very glad to consider and investigate those matters.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman's request for the present consideration of this resolution? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Then, Mr. Speaker, without objection, I move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHBROOK] moves the previous question on the resolution.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw that motion temporarily for the purpose of permitting the gentleman from Connecticut to offer an amendment.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the reading of the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHBROOK] withdraws his motion for the previous question. The question is on agreeing to the substitute reported by the committee, which is in the nature of an amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the amendment of the gentleman from Connecticut is in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I think that ought to be read.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 7, at the end of line 14, add: "And a detailed statement of expenses so incurred shall accompany and be a part of the committee report."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the substitute.

The question was taken, and the amendment to the substitute was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs on the substitute as amended by the amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add, at the end of line 4, page 6, "and the establishment and discontinuance of star routes."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is now on agreeing to the substitute reported by the committee as amended by the amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut.

The question was taken, and the amended committee substitute was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. ASHBROOK, a motion to reconsider the vote last taken was laid on the table.

SESSION CLERKS TO HOUSE COMMITTEES, ETC.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following privileged resolution from the Committee on Accounts.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD] offers a privileged resolution from the Committee on Accounts, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 158 (H. Rept. 26).

Resolved, That there shall be paid, out of the contingent fund of the House during the remainder of the first session of the Sixty-second Congress, compensation at the rates and for the purposes hereinafter indicated, namely:

For the services of a clerk to each of the following-named committees, at $125 per month: On Expenditures in the State Department, on Expenditures in the Treasury Department, on Expenditures in the War Department, on Expenditures in the Navy Department, on Expenditures in the Post Office Department, on Expenditures on Public Buildings, on Expenditures in the Interior Department, on Expenditures in the Department of Justice, on Expenditures in the Department of Agriculture, on Expenditures in the Department of Commerce and Labor, on the Election of President, Vice President, and Representatives in Congress, on Reform in the Civil Service, and on the Disposition of Useless Executive Papers; and to the Committee on the Territories, an assistant clerk. The pay of said clerks shall commence from the time they entered upon the discharge of their duties, which shall be ascertained and evidenced by the certificates of the chairmen of said committees.

For the services of a messenger to the Committee on the Disposition of Useless Executive Papers, at $60 per month.

For a janitor at $60 per month, who shall, under the direction of the Doorkeeper, perform service in the rooms of the following-named committees located in the House wing of the Capitol, to wit: Expenditures in the State Department, Expenditures in the Treasury Department, Expenditures in the War Department, Expenditures in the Department of Agriculture, Reform in the Civil Service, Railways and Canals, and Education.

Mr. LLOYD. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. CARLIN].

The SPEAKER. How much time?

Mr. LLOYD. I yield the control of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Speaker, this resolution was made necessary in order to perfect the organization of the existing committees of the House. In order that the House may fully understand exactly what is accomplished in the resolution, and to avoid useless discussion, I will ask the Clerk to read the report on the resolution as a part of my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the report.

The Clerk read as follows:

[House Report No. 26, Sixty-second Congress, first session.]

PROVISION FOR CLERKS FOR THE SO-CALLED EXPENDITURE COMMITTEES.

The Committee on Accounts, to whom was referred House resolution No. 158, have had the same under consideration and recommend its adoption.

This resolution provides for 12 clerks and 1 assistant clerk during the present session at the rate of $125 per month each to the 10 so-called expenditure committees and to the Committees on the Disposition of Useless Executive Papers, and Reform in the Civil Service, and the Territories, the pay of such clerks to commence from the time they entered upon the discharge of their duties, which shall be ascertained and evidenced by the certificate of the chairmen of said committees. It also provides for a messenger at the rate of $60 per month to the Committee on the Disposition of Useless Papers, as heretofore allowed, and one janitor to take care of seven committee rooms located in the House wing of the Capitol that are now without janitor service.

This resolution does not increase the number of offices over the number provided heretofore for like service; it actually decreases them and reduces the compensation of certain committee clerks from $6 per day to $125 per month, and still allows for an assistant clerk to the Committee on the Territories, a new authorization.

In the last Congress 9 of the expenditure committees were allowed session clerks at $125 per month. We provide for 10, including 1 to the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice, whose then chairman was ill in the last Congress.

Thirteen other committees were granted session clerks in the last Congress at $6 per day, five of which committees have been abolished in this Congress. We provide for two only of the remaining eight and reduce the pay from $6 per day to $125 per month, which, with the assistant clerk to Territories, still makes a net reduction of nine clerks, including those to the committees abolished.

In the last Congress seven session janitors, at $60 per month each, were assigned to 14 rooms in the House wing of the Capitol. In this Congress only seven of the committees thus served are located in the Capitol. Those removed to the House Office Building are served by its char force. Therefore we provide but one janitor for the seven rooms of committees remaining in the Capitol, a reduction of six janitors.

Only an approximate estimate can be made of the saving to be effected by this resolution owing to the indeterminate length of the session. Assuming its length as six months from the date of the appointment of committees—April 11—the saving on committee clerks alone is about $10,000, and on janitors $2,000, or a total saving of $12,000.

In the consideration of this proposition a subcommittee of the Committee on Accounts heard the chairman of the respective expenditure committees, who represented that it is the purpose of those committees to go to work at once upon the matters within their jurisdiction, and under authority of the resolution of the House adopted April 20, 1911, prosecute investigations of the executive departments in all of their branches and ramifications, and that for this work they would need clerical assistance.

The jurisdiction and functions of the various committees on expenditures in the executive departments, as prescribed by Rule X, are too well known to require comment or elaboration. They were fully discussed in previous reports of the Committee on Accounts. (See H. Repts. 1121, 1–60; 1804, 2–60; 139, 2–61.)

It is a matter of public information that those committees, as now constituted, propose thoroughly to investigate the executive departments.

The Committee on Reform in the Civil Service have demonstrated satisfactorily that they need a clerk at this time; in fact, have had one at work since the committee was appointed, as has the Committee on the Territories, for whom we provide an assistant clerk.

A session clerk to the Committee on the Disposition of Useless Executive Papers, at $6 per day, has been granted ever since the passage of the law under which it operates. We propose like service for this session at $125 per month. Under the present rules this is now a standing committee. It is intended as a check upon the heads of departments or bureau chiefs against the destruction or removal of any public records or papers until such records have been personally inspected by a joint committee of the House and Senate and their destruction recommended by such committee.

In one instance alone its work involved examination and report on public records in seven different buildings and bureaus of the Interior Department, and in another the examination of records and papers in five bureaus of the Department of Commerce and Labor. The clerk keeps a record of every transaction, prepares the committee's reports, and renders other necessary service.

The employment of the several clerks hereby proposed is limited to the remainder of the present session, but inasmuch as it appears that this authority was contemplated and the clerks already have performed some service, provision is made for their pay to commence from the time they entered upon the discharge of their duties, which shall be ascertained and evidenced by the certificate of the chairmen of the several committees. In no case can the pay commence prior to April 11, 1911, the day on which the committees were elected. This provision follows the exact language of the law with respect to session clerks to committees provided for annually in the legislative act.

Believing the proposed employments to be in the interest of the public business as well as economical, the accompanying resolution is reported favorably and its adoption recommended with the following amendment:

In lines 15 and 16 strike out "on the Election of President, Vice President, and Representatives in Congress."

C. C. CARLIN, for Committee.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Speaker, this report fully sets out in detail the reasons for the resolution, and the reforms which are accomplished.

The net saving under this arrangement is about $12,000 per session, or $24,000 a year. It is brought about by simply rearranging and readjusting the session clerks and janitors. We abolish the janitors for these committee rooms in the House Office Building and turn that service over to the regular janitor service.

In the Capitol we allow one janitor for the five committees that sit in this building, an abolition of six.

A further saving is accomplished by reducing the pay of these session clerks from $6 a day to $125 a month. In that way we bring about a uniform system of pay and a uniform reduction.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Virginia yield to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. CARLIN. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. BARTLETT. The pay of the clerks in the various committees on expenditures in the different departments was $125 last session.

Mr. CARLIN. I think it was in many of them $6 a day.

Mr. BARTLETT. No; the expenditure committees was $125.

Mr. CARLIN. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. Except in the expenditure in the Department of Justice, and there was no clerk to that committee.

Mr. CARLIN. And the Committee on Disposition of Useless Papers.

Mr. BARTLETT. They had a clerk at $6 a day.

Mr. CARLIN. We make it $125 a month.

Mr. BARTLETT. The Committee on the Territories has never had an assistant clerk before this resolution.

Mr. CARLIN. That is true.

Mr. BARTLETT. All of the business that has heretofore been transacted by that committee, including the bills to admit Oklahoma, New Mexico, and Arizona, and the business concerning the Territory of Alaska, has been attended to by that committee without the assistance of an assistant clerk, and this resolution creates a new place for an assistant clerk to the Committee on the Territories.

Mr. CARLIN. That is true. Are there any more questions which the gentleman would like to ask?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. What is the necessity for an assistant clerk to the Committee on the Territories?

Mr. CARLIN. The gentleman will find that this resolution provides only for session service and for this session alone. We have provided in this resolution for none of these committees beyond the present extra session of Congress. All of this service is confined entirely to this short session of Congress, and we have taken as our guide as to the necessities for these clerks the representation of the chairmen of the various committees, and upon the representation of the chairman of the Committee on the Territories that they would need this additional clerk during this short session, we allowed it.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I ask the gentleman another question?

Mr. CARLIN. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. Is the business of the Committee on the Territories at this short session going to be more onerous or greater than it was before? I served on the Committee on Accounts for a number of years, and I do not think the chairman of the Committee on the Territories ever asked for an assistant clerk before.

Mr. CARLIN. Is that the gentleman's full question?

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes; I want to know why the Committee on the Territories——

Mr. CARLIN. I am not able to tell the gentleman what has been asked for heretofore, because I have not served on the Committee on Accounts until this session of Congress. What has gone before is past, and we are dealing with conditions as we find them to-day.

Mr. BARTLETT. The question I intended to ask the gentleman is if the business before the Committee on the Territories at this session of Congress is greater and requires the assistance of more clerks than ever at any time in recent years?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, if I may be permitted——

Mr. CARLIN. Oh, let me answer the gentleman, and I will give him the committee's reason. I will say to the gentleman that we find that some of these committees have less business than ever before——

Mr. BARTLETT. But I asked about a particular committee.

Mr. CARLIN. I am coming to that. I will particularize with reference to other committees so that the gentleman may have full information. I would not want him to be informed on one committee only. I want him to know about them all.

Mr. BARTLETT. I am informed——

Mr. CARLIN. For fear the gentleman is not, I am going to tell him the whole story. We have concluded in this resolution, which the gentleman will observe, not to give session clerks to many committees that have had them before. Indeed, some of the committees have been abolished, clerk and all. In many of these committees clerks have been given where the committee had no necessity for them at all, but we are determined to put them to work, and they have agreed to go to work. In order to do that work it will be necessary to have session clerks.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. CARLIN. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman state——

Mr. CARLIN. The Committee on the Department of Justice is one that had no work last session.

Mr. BARTLETT. I want to know what committee which has not been abolished, but which heretofore had a clerk, this resolution does not give a clerk to?

Mr. CARLIN. Mines and Mining, Railways and Canals, Education, and a number of others. The gentleman told me he was informed, and that was the reason why I did not mention them in the first place.

Mr. BARTLETT. I notice the gentleman was not informed, but had to consult a memorandum.

Mr. CARLIN. I had a memorandum with information on it, which bears my signature.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Virginia yield to the gentleman from South Carolina?

Mr. CARLIN. I do.

Mr. LEVER. I was about to say that the gentleman from Virginia ought to yield to his colleague to explain why it is necessary to have this assistant clerk to the Committee on the Territories. The gentleman seems rather long about getting to the proposition.

Mr. CARLIN. I will yield to whomever I feel disposed at the right time.

Mr. LEVER. But the House is entitled to the information, and we are not getting it very quickly.

Mr. CARLIN. The House is not entitled to have that of the gentleman until he is ready to give it.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. The gentleman had better explain before we take the vote.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Virginia yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. CARLIN. I do.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I think it is very important that we should get this explanation of why the Committee on the Territories needs an assistant clerk, because, for myself as one Member of this House, until the explanation is made, I shall vote against this resolution. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CARLIN. Now, does the gentleman ask that in the shape of a question?

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. CARLIN. I will say to the gentleman I thought I had answered it when I said that the committee in awarding all of these session clerks had done so upon the representation of the chairmen of the various committees. We had no other means of determining what committees needed those clerks and what services were to be performed, except by inquiry of the chairmen of these committees.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia and several gentlemen rose.

The SPEAKER. To whom does the gentleman from Virginia yield?

Mr. CARLIN. I am going to yield to the gentleman from Virginia, the chairman of the Committee on the Territories.

The SPEAKER. How much time does the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I just wish to answer the gentleman's question. The question has been asked, What is the necessity for an assistant clerk to the Committee on the Territories?

In answering the question that has been put to my colleague from Virginia I will say that that committee is probably doing more work at this session of Congress than any other committee of this House except the Committee on Ways and Means. Ever since Congress has been in session it has been meeting daily considering the question of the statehood bills of Arizona and New Mexico, and as soon as that is disposed of, we are going to take up the Alaskan bill providing for a territorial government for Alaska. There are 20 Members on that committee and those Members require the assistance of a clerk looking into various questions that arise before that committee, and one clerk has not been able to do all the work up to this point, and I do not believe he will be, to do it thorough, this session, and, as I understand this provision, it provides for an assistant session clerk to the committee for this extra session. I believe it is necessary for the dispatch of business of that committee, and, in that belief, I am indorsed by the members of the committee, and I hope the House will vote to give that assistant session clerk. The committee is going to work steadily on through this session on the various propositions that are before the committee, and there are some important propositions before that committee, which has certainly more work to do during this session than most any of the other committees of the House.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman from Virginia a question.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Virginia yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. CARLIN. Yes; I will yield for a question to be asked.

Mr. PALMER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] says that they have been considering a territorial bill with reference to New Mexico and Arizona.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. PALMER. I take it that it is no secret that if that bill ever passes it will take those Territories outside of the jurisdiction of the Committee on Territories?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. That is true.

Mr. PALMER. So that after that bill is passed, which is going to be introduced to-morrow or going to be considered to-morrow——

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. No.

Mr. MANN. How does the gentleman from Pennsylvania know?

Mr. PALMER. In the near future——

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. PALMER (continuing). The jurisdiction of the Committee on Territories will be less than it has been in the past?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. That is true.

Mr. PALMER. And consequently the work of the committee will be less?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. The work of the committee will not be less for this session of Congress, because it has to go into the Alaskan question, which, I understand, has not been considered by Congress for a number of years; and there are a great number of bills pending here in reference to Alaska; and the statehood bill will be back and forth between this body and the Senate probably for some time. This work will occupy the attention of that committee closely and will necessitate a considerable clerical force.

Mr. FOWLER rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. With pleasure.

Mr. FOWLER. I desire to know if this committee has ever had an assistant clerk in the past.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I can not answer that question. I know it has not one now and did not have one in the last Congress. I do not know what it has had in the past. Its jurisdiction at one time was larger than it is now, and it may have had one; but it did not have one in the last Congress and has not one now. But I do say to the gentleman from Illinois the committee is going into a broader field of work now than it has gone into for some time in the past.

Mr. FOWLER. And the only broader field it goes into is the Alaskan question. Is that true?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. There may be some additional matters in reference to Hawaii.

Mr. FOWLER. What about the Insular Committee as to those affairs?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. We have nothing to do with the Insular Committee. They have to deal with the Philippines and Porto Rico.

Mr. FOWLER. And Hawaii is not included, then, with the Philippines and Porto Rico?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. No.

Mr. FOWLER. It is a Territory?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. CARLIN. Now, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARLIN. Yes; I will.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. I wanted to ask the chairman of the committee a question, and that is if the Committee on the Territories did not consider Alaskan matters during the last session of Congress without an assistant clerk?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I do not think they went very fully into those matters. Certainly not as fully as we intend to go into them at this time, and no legislation was secured, which we hope to be able to do.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. I would like to ask, for information, whether they do not have the Alaskan question up, together with the admission of Arizona and New Mexico?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Yes; and there is a tremendous lot of legislation in relation to Alaska. Every question of a legislative character relating to Alaska goes before the committee. I do not know whether they are just or not, but there are complaints that those matters have not been considered during the past few sessions of Congress. We do not want to leave any reason for complaint on that ground. We want to dispose of all those matters, and in addition to that we want to form a Territorial government for Alaska, at least to bring a bill in for this House to consider, and I do think we need that clerk; and I hope that the Members of this House will not undertake to amend this resolution by striking that clerk out.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Virginia yield to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. CARLIN. For how long?

Mr. GOOD. For just two minutes.

Mr. CARLIN. Certainly.

Mr. GOOD. I want to say to the chairman of the Committee on the Territories that it is but fair to the Committee on the Territories of the last Congress to say that I do not believe that he could possibly have read the record that that committee made during the last Congress. There was hardly a day but that the Committee on the Territories was in session considering matters with regard to Alaska and with regard to Hawaii and Arizona and New Mexico. There are hundreds and hundreds of printed pages of testimony that was taken before that committee relating to the Territory of Alaska.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Let me interrupt the gentleman right there.

Mr. GOOD. And at that time and during that period there was not a time when the clerk of the Committee on the Territories had not ample time to perform all the duties that devolved upon him. He was not busy all the time; and the present Committee on the Territories, if it sits and discusses questions relative to Alaska such as were discussed in the last Congress——

Mr. CARLIN. The gentleman must put his question in the form of a question. I can not yield for a speech.

Mr. MANN. Does not the gentleman intend to give anybody any time on this side of the House? If that is the situation, we will have to have a quorum right away.

Mr. CARLIN. I want to give the gentleman as much time as may be right.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman can not yield just such time as he thinks proper without a quorum present.

Mr. CARLIN. I can yield my time as I see fit.

The SPEAKER. The gentlemen are out of order.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] two minutes.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] makes the point of no quorum. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and twenty-four Members are present——

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withdraw his point of no quorum?

Mr. MANN. The point of no quorum will not be withdrawn unless there is a fair distribution of time.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, there is no disposition here to cut off debate, and there is no disposition to mistreat anyone. I will say in behalf of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. CARLIN], who just had the floor, that I am sure he misunderstood the situation with respect to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD]. The gentleman from Iowa desired two minutes' time, and I thought Mr. CARLIN had so understood, and that Mr. CARLIN had yielded to him that much time. But the gentleman from Virginia, as I understand, thought that the gentleman from Iowa had interrupted him merely to ask a question.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, it is now 5 o'clock, and the House has been in session nearly five hours. During that time this side of the House has consumed less than 45 minutes, while that side of the House has consumed all the rest of the time, and aside from the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD] Members on that side have yielded grudgingly to questions asked by Members on this side of the House.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] insist on a point of no quorum?

Mr. MADDEN. Unless, Mr. Speaker, there is some disposition manifested by the gentleman from Virginia to give an equal and fair division of time I will insist. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. CARLIN] stated a moment ago that he would yield what time he thought proper, and stated that he controlled the time. If that is the disposition of the gentleman, of course I will not withdraw my point of no quorum.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman that I understood I had yielded to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] for the specific purpose of permitting him to ask a question, and instead of asking a question he went on to make a speech. I have no disposition to deny any gentleman any time he wants, but if I yield five minutes to a gentleman I do not yield five hours.

Mr. MADDEN. I have no disposition, Mr. Speaker, to dispute the point with the gentleman, but I do insist that the gentleman from Virginia shall be fair about the disposition of time.

Mr. CARLIN. I have no disposition to be unfair. How much time, I will ask the gentleman from Iowa, does he desire?

Mr. GOOD. Two minutes.

Mr. CARLIN. Then, Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GOOD. While considering this question of economy, I think it would be well to look into this question of the necessity of an assistant clerk to the Committee on Territories. In the last Congress the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD] attended practically every meeting of the Committee on Territories, I think, and I know he will not say that that committee did not go into the many Alaskan subjects fully and completely during the last session of Congress. That committee went into the question of Territorial government for Alaska; it went into the question of the fisheries of Alaska; it went into the question of the insane in Alaska; it went into the question of placer mining in Alaska. In a word, it went into every question raised by the numerous bills introduced in this House with regard to Alaskan affairs, and no committee could have been more thorough in its investigation or more painstaking in its labors than was the Committee on Territories during the last Congress. And yet that committee did not then require the services of an assistant clerk. I think this is very poor economy. If it is the same kind of economy that was presented in the resolutions we have passed to-day, it will not be long until you will find the figures on the other side of the column. Instead of retrenchment and reform, you will be spending more money for committee clerks and for help of this kind than the last Congress expended. Here is a step in that direction. Others will no doubt follow.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I want to say to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] that I did not intend—I do not think I said, and I certainly did not intend to convey the impression—that the Committee on the Territories in the last session did not work. I believe it did much work. I believe it did as much work as any committee of this House, and I believe it has probably more work to do in this session than any other committee of this House except the Committee on Ways and Means. For the reason that it has all this work, I believe it is entitled to an assistant clerk. There are other committees that are doing a great deal less work than that committee is doing that have not only assistant session clerks, but assistant annual clerks. Now, I know that what the gentleman says about the work done by the Committee on the Territories during the last Congress is true, because the records will show it. That committee is in session two, three, or four times every week, and it does need the assistance of competent clerks to keep its records up and to get the data and information in reference to matters with which it is dealing.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Virginia yield to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I do.

Mr. GOOD. What I understood the gentleman to say, and what I think the RECORD will show he said, is that the Committee on the Territories in the last Congress did not go into the question of Territorial government for Alaska. We did go into that question fully.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. What I intended to say was that they did not bring out bills in reference to Alaska. The idea I have is that there has been little legislation in reference to Alaska by this House in the past three or four years, and there is a great deal of legislation that is now needed. That committee had a great many hearings, but the gentleman knows there were not many bills brought out from that committee and passed through this House. There has been very little legislation in reference to Alaska for the last four or five years. A great deal is now needed, not only with reference to the Territorial legislation, but other matters for that immense country, and in order properly to conduct the business of this committee it does need an assistant to the clerk that it has. As I said before, I trust that no misunderstanding that may have occurred upon this floor in reference to the division of time will induce gentlemen to vote against a proposition that is meritorious.

Mr. CARLIN. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I want to call the attention of the House to the situation in which we are going to place ourselves when we create this office of assistant clerk to the Committee on the Territories. We started out by telling the country and the Republican side of the House that we intended to run this House on a business basis, and that they had been extravagant in the conduct of the business of the House and had a great many more employees than were necessary. After passing a resolution to do away with some of them, the very next resolution that comes in is a proposition to create a new office that the Republican House never had occasion to create. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Now, you gentlemen on this side of the House, when you adopt a resolution creating the position of assistant clerk to the Committee on the Territories, will simply open the way for other places to be created; and if the argument used by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] is correct, that his committee does more work or as much work as other committees having assistant clerks, then, instead of giving his committee an assistant clerk, it is the duty of the Committee on Accounts to report a resolution recommending the discontinuance of the assistant clerks that these useless committees already have.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. GARNER. Yes.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. If this clerk is needed, whether provided in the past or not, is it extravagant to provide him now when he is needed by the committee?

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I am unwilling to admit that a Democratic committee is unable to do the work that the Republican committee has done for several years. I will not stand here and admit that this committee, now admittedly having no more work—and it can not possibly have any more work—to do than in the last Congress, is unable to conduct its business with a $2,000 clerk, when the Republican committee did, and God knows they did not need anything they did not ask for and always got. [Applause and laughter.] The truth of the business is that we ought not to create this additional clerk, and when you do it, fellow Democrats, when you do this, do not ever again criticize the Committee on Accounts for bringing in provision for new places and useless places, because in my judgment there has not been a proposition and there will not be a proposition submitted to the Committee on Accounts that is absolutely of as little necessity as this assistant clerk. [Applause.]

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman to yield.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARNER. Yes.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I have had some experience in the work of the different committees. Will the gentleman tell me what possible duties an assistant clerk would have on this committee?

Mr. GARNER. I think largely drawing the salary. [Laughter and applause.] That is my judgment about it. Mr. Speaker, I simply wanted to call the attention of this side of the House to the fact that you are creating a new place, which the Republicans did not need, and paving the way for other offices of a similar character. [Applause.]

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LEVER. When will amendments be in order to this resolution? I desire to offer an amendment at the proper time.

The SPEAKER. Whenever any Member gets the floor in his own right he has the right to offer any amendment he pleases. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. CARLIN] has control of the time for one hour. If he yields the floor, then the gentleman can do that.

Mr. LEVER. I understand the gentleman from Virginia is willing to yield the time to me to offer an amendment.

Mr. MANN. If he yields the floor, he yields it, and that is all there is to it.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Virginia yields to the gentleman from South Carolina to offer an amendment, the gentleman from Virginia forfeits his right to the floor.

Mr. CARLIN. I understand, but I would yield only on that condition and for that purpose.

Mr. MANN. Oh, we can not conduct that kind of a parliamentary school here.

Mr. CARLIN. Does the gentleman from Illinois desire some time?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, one of the items in this resolution is a clerk to the Committee on the Disposition of Useless Executive Papers, and another is for a messenger to the Committee on the Disposition of Useless Executive Papers. Of course, that has always heretofore been a janitor. I would like to inquire of the Speaker whether the Speaker has appointed the House members of the Committee on the Disposition of Useless Executive Papers.

The SPEAKER. The Speaker has not appointed any such committee.

Mr. MANN. The law providing for the disposition of useless executive papers provides that a joint committee of the House and Senate, the House members to be appointed by the Speaker, may pass upon useless executive papers at the request of the departments and authorize their destruction. Anyone who destroys a paper in the executive departments without authority of law commits a crime, for which he may be punished, and anyone who authorizes the destruction of papers except in pursuance of law will commit a crime. The law, and not the House, controls. The law provides that the House members of the joint committee which has control of the disposition of these papers shall be appointed by the Speaker, and I would suggest that, in view of the fact that the House has elected two members of this committee as constituting the House members of the committee, the same two members be appointed by the Speaker, so that these gentlemen will be protected if they authorize the destruction of public documents, which otherwise would be a crime; and unless that be done, there is no reason for providing for a clerk and a messenger to the committee, because the committee can do nothing under the law until the committee is appointed in conformity with the law.

Mr. COX of Indiana. When was that statute passed?

Mr. MANN. I am perfectly willing to give to that committee, when it is properly appointed and can perform the business of the office, a clerk and a messenger, or a clerk and a janitor. Why they changed the word "janitor" to "messenger" I do not know, but I suppose the office is to be filled by a white gentleman instead of a colored man, as usually has been the case heretofore. Just why you have need of a janitor for these offices in this building I can not understand. The janitor that has been given to committees heretofore has been intended to do messenger work in addition to the janitor work of the committee. I have had as chairman of a committee of this House a janitor for six or eight years, and that janitor has always worked from early morn until late in the afternoon, doing work that was of benefit to the public. He has earned his pay, and earned it so well that he is now drawing pay from the pocket of yours truly.

Mr. HAMLIN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. HAMLIN. I think I agree with the gentleman that these janitors should be appropriated for, and I want to offer an amendment for "janitor and messenger" for these committees, because undoubtedly the committee not only needs a janitor to clean the committee rooms, but it needs a messenger for all of these committees mentioned.

Mr. MANN. I was going to say, so far as the janitor service is concerned the mere cleaning up of the committee rooms can be most efficiently and economically performed by the regular janitor force in the Capitol Building, unless the janitor in addition is also to be a messenger and they are not all clerks. Now, for instance, these committees in this building have to go after their own mail. Members in the House Office Building have letter carriers deliver their mail to them two, three, four, or five times a day, but if you happen to occupy rooms in this building you have to go to the Office Building to get your mail or send somebody else. I suppose the Committee on Accounts intends that the distinguished chairmen of these committees shall take the time to trot over to the Office Building to get their mail.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. MANN. I will.

Mr. GARNER. I believe there are some twenty-odd committees located in the Capitol at present. Out of the number, I am not certain, but I think they have some 13 or 14 janitors. Does not the gentleman think it would be better if the House would in some way arrange that mail should be delivered to the committee rooms over here rather than to have 14 mail carriers to 14 committees?

Mr. MANN. I think mail ought to be delivered over here, and I tried to get it through the House once, but all the gentlemen on that side voted against it, and a few on this side voting the same killed it.

Mr. BARTLETT. I beg the gentleman's pardon, I did not——

Mr. MANN. Well, the gentleman from Georgia is always an exception.

Mr. BARTLETT. I reported it from the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is a good exception. I am not in favor of hampering the committees by dispensing with the services of good employees. When I employ a man to work for me I think I am delinquent if I do not provide him with the proper tools to do the work; and the proper tools with which the committee can work are the employees to that committee as well as the members of that committee, and no committee can do good work unless it is provided with a competent clerk, and in some cases an assistant clerk and a messenger, so that the committee and the chairman can keep in touch with what is going on.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS].

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I am not on the Committee on Accounts. I am not on the Committee on Territories. I am not very populistic in my tendencies as to the payment of salaries, but I am opposed to this assistant clerk for the Committee on the Territories for one sole reason, and that reason is that we ought to be absolutely fair and we ought to practice what we preach. We have had a good deal to do and say about economy, and I compliment the committee for their economy and their activity in throwing out a lot of fellows that are useless to the House. But we ought not, even because of the affection all of us may have for the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] and his entire committee, to come back on the same day that we are demolishing jobs and add another that the Republican organization for the last 16 years has not demanded. There is no one here who has denied the proposition that the Committee on Territories has never before had an assistant clerk, and I believe no one now is ready to deny that proposition, and I do not think we ought to stand here and insist upon having a place that they have not had right on the eve of our economy program.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield to me a minute?

Mr. CARLIN. I yield a minute to the gentleman.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I want to say, Mr. Speaker, I believe this assistant clerk is needed by this committee, but I do not want to put the committee or myself in the position of violating a policy of economy that has been established and gentlemen seem to think will be violated by creating this position. I do not believe it is good economy to deny the necessary force to any committee in this House, and I believe this clerk is needed. Therefore, I would vote for it, and did ask this House to vote for it. But I do not care to put the Democratic side or the committee in the position of being criticized on the ground that we had advocated economy in one place and were extravagant in another. Therefore, I ask the gentleman in charge of this bill to offer an amendment striking out the assistant clerkship to the Committee on the Territories. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COX].

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I desire to elicit information more than to address the House. I find it is very inconvenient for us to get our mail over here in our committee room in the Capitol Building, and I would like to inquire of some member of the Committee on Accounts whether or not it was contemplated in furnishing a janitor to these committees that he act as mail messenger to bring our mail to our committee room? There are four or five committees over here occupying the same position that I am in this particular. I have no doubt in the world but that this janitor will have plenty of time to carry our mail to us, but what I am particularly interested in is to have this resolution strong enough to require him to bring this mail to us.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I think there can be no question about that proposition. The janitor provided would receive $60 a month, should employ all of his time, and he would be expected not only to sweep the floors and perform other janitor duty, but in addition to that he would be expected to perform that duty which all janitors perform, namely, the duties of a messenger.

Mr. GARNER. Heretofore the janitors have brought the mail, and I imagine if you secured a janitor under this resolution and he refused to bring the mail, an intimation from the one who employs him that he would lose his job if he did not go for the mail would cause him to do it or give up his position.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I have asked my janitor to bring my mail over, and he has refused to do it; and if there is going to be some pressure brought to bear on him by which I can get him to do it, I want to know what it is.

Mr. GARNER. From what source does the janitor receive his appointment?

Mr. COX of Indiana. I do not know.

Mr. GARNER. Possibly he is a hold over.

Mr. COX of Indiana. As I understand, Mr. Speaker, from the chairman of this committee, it was in the contemplation of the Committee on Accounts that this janitor should do this service.

Mr. CARLIN. I will call the gentleman's attention to the fact, if he will let me do it, that annual janitors to the committees are appointed, and shall perform, under the direction of the Doorkeeper, all the duties required of messengers, and the same thing applies to special-session janitors——

Mr. COX of Indiana. With the assurance of the chairman of this committee——

Mr. CARLIN (continuing). And they dismiss them if they do not do it.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I will be content and make my complaint to the committee in the event he does not do his work.

Mr. MANN. Who appoints the janitor?

Mr. CARLIN. The Doorkeeper.

Mr. MANN. It does not say so.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER].

Mr. MANN. Before the gentleman from Missouri proceeds will the gentleman from Virginia yield to me for a question?

Mr. CARLIN. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Who will appoint the messenger to the Committee on the Disposition of Useless Executive Papers?

Mr. CARLIN. The chairman of the committee, under the authority of the rule.

Mr. MANN. There is no such rule.

Mr. CARLIN. The committee must confirm, but the chairman of the committee nominates the messenger to the committee.

Mr. MANN. I do not think there is any such rule.

Mr. CARLIN. There is a rule of the House that provides for it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I have a complaint, too, and my complaint is that the Committee on Accounts is just a little bit too darned economical. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Does not the gentleman get a committee clerk, or does he go out?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. No; I get none. That is what I am kicking about. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. Then I am with the gentleman on that.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Inadvertently or unintentionally the Committee on Committees recommended me for the chairmanship of one of the most important committees of this House. [Laughter.] That action was confirmed by the House. The committee of which I was appointed chairman deals with some of the most important questions that come before Congress. It deals with questions pertaining to the Constitution of the United States. Before the committee appointment had been ratified by the House, in the Democratic caucus—and I have no objection to taking all gentlemen into my confidence and explaining it to them—it was ordered and adjudged that that Committee on Election of President, Vice President, and Representatives in Congress should consider and report to this House two great questions, two great measures, one relating to the election of Senators by the people, and the other pertaining to the publicity of campaign contributions before elections.

We performed the task imposed upon us, and promptly we responded to the demand of the country as echoed in the Democratic caucus by reporting the very next day after we were appointed both of these measures to the House. I know that gentlemen on that side of the House said we were too hasty, and that the measures were not well considered in committee, and I myself thought for a time that perhaps we had allowed our Democratic enthusiasm to run away with our judgment, because there was so much complaint over there on that side. [Laughter.] But when we submitted the first measure to a vote they could find only 13 on that side——

Mr. AUSTIN. Sixteen.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Sixteen, did the gentleman say? I think one of them voted by mistake, and that would leave 15. But 15 or 16 only in the entire membership voted against that measure, which was alleged to have been so poorly considered and so hastily reported by the committee.

Then we took up the other measure the next day, and gentlemen on that side fussed and fumed and quarreled and offered all sorts of amendments, to the confusion of some of us on this side; but we stood like a solid phalanx, commissioned by the people of the country, and voted down every amendment except one or two which improved the bill, and on its final passage I rejoice to proclaim that every Member, whether Democrat or Republican, who registered his vote voted for the publicity bill. Everybody voted for it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I recall that we did our work so well that the bills we brought in were passed without the change of a word—without the dotting of an "i" or the crossing of a "t." These two measures had substantially unanimous support, and I believe they are going to receive pretty nearly the same unanimous support at the other end of the Capitol. But if the Committee on Accounts, in doling out and dishing out clerical help to the various committees of the House with an eye single to economy, will look about, they will find, as they go through the corridors both of the Capitol Building and the House Office Building, men sitting at some doors to whom even members of the Committee on Accounts will have to introduce themselves and announce their business in order to be admitted into the holy of holies of some chairmen of committees—committees that occupy no more important or dignified positions than the one which I have the honor to preside over. They will find not only an annual clerk, but a janitor or messenger in attendance upon those committees, the clerk drawing $2,000 per annum and the janitor drawing $720. I only wanted a clerk, but it seems the Committee on Accounts thinks I do not need or merit one.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I should like a few minutes more.

Mr. CARLIN. How much time have I left?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has nine minutes left.

Mr. CARLIN. I yield to the gentleman eight minutes of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized for eight minutes.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I thank the gentleman. I want to say that I believe in the economy that the House is practicing, but I want to suggest to the chairman and to the other able gentlemen on that committee that they do not begin at the bottom of the round all the time. I say to them the committee over which I have the honor to preside is as much entitled to a clerk as any other committee in this House that is of no greater dignity or importance and that deals with no more important matters; and yet, with the charge impressed upon us that we must go to work, we have been supplied with no clerical force. There are half a dozen committees in the Office Building which I say to you in all earnestness I do not believe will have one committee meeting between now and December, and those committees have clerks—annual clerks and janitors.

Mr. MANN. Bring in a resolution to abolish the offices.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. They have clerks drawing $2,000 a year, and janitors, and yet they will not have any meeting.

I sought to get a clerk, but the Committee on Accounts, in dealing with the committee of which I have the honor to be chairman, instead of recommending an annual clerk for that committee or leaving it where the Republicans had placed it, on a $6 a day basis, actually cut it down to about $4 a day, and therefore I asked the Committee on Accounts to strike it out entirely, because if I can not preside over that committee without humiliation I will not do it at all. [Applause.]

I do not intend to have it that way. If it is necessary, in the interest of Democratic economy, to take my clerk away, why, do it, gentlemen. With the help of my secretary we will manage to get along; but I will not accept a 75-cent rate when other committees have $2,000 clerkships. I say the Committee on Accounts must treat the Committee on Election of President, Vice President, and Representatives in Congress like the balance of them, and either bring them down to my level or bring me up to their level, or else ignore my committee completely; and at my suggestion the Committee on Accounts have stricken from this resolution the little pittance that they had generously determined to allow me for clerk hire. If the Committee on Election of President, Vice President, and Representatives in Congress is not worthy of better treatment, I think you ought to abolish it, gentlemen. It is not a matter that is personal to me. Do as your wisdom inclines you.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Certainly.

Mr. GARNER. Is it not a fact that the committees to which the gentleman refers—five or six of them—as of no greater dignity than his and having no more business coming before them for consideration, under the present law, have committee clerks at $2,000 a year, and messengers?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Each of them has a clerk and a janitor or messenger.

Mr. GARNER. And heretofore the gentleman's committee has had a session clerk only?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Yes; at $6 per day.

Mr. GARNER. And that if this Committee on Accounts should report a resolution giving the gentleman's committee a clerk at $2,000 a year, would it not be an addition to what that committee ever had under a Republican administration?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Yes; but that would be only treating this committee as others are treated.

Mr. Speaker, further replying to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER], I would say that if the House gave me a $2,000 clerkship, it would be a raise in the salary above what it had been; but let me say to the gentleman from Texas that they might have let me alone at $6 a day and not humiliated me.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman will realize another fact, that in this resolution in dealing with committees that have heretofore had session clerks at $6 a day, the committee has placed them on a parity with other session clerks at $125 a month.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. That is true, as stated by the gentleman from Texas; but I believe it is also true that those committees who were reduced a little in the per diem of their clerks were given janitors, and I have never had a janitor or a messenger—I would not know what one is.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to amend this resolution by striking out, on page 2, line 1, the words:

And to the Committee on the Territories, an assistant clerk.

Mr. OLMSTED. I object.

Mr. CARLIN. Then I move that as an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 1, strike out "and to the Committee on the Territories, an assistant clerk."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend by striking out, beginning on page 1, line 15, down to line 16, the following words:

On the Election of President, Vice President, and Representatives in Congress.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, lines 15 and 16, strike out the words "on the Election of President, Vice President, and Representatives in Congress."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to inquire from the gentleman from Virginia and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER], before we vote on this amendment, whether it is proposed to follow the striking of this out with a resolution providing for a $2,000 clerk for a committee which has already in the course of two or three weeks disposed of all the business that will come before it in two years?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, if I may be permitted to answer the gentleman——

Mr. MANN. I was asking the chairman of the Committee on Accounts, but still the gentleman from Missouri can answer it very readily.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. If the gentleman will permit, I will be very glad to do it.

Mr. CARLIN. I wish to say that the committee has not considered that matter as yet, and I have no authority to speak for the committee.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit, I want to say, in the first place, that the gentleman is as grossly in error as he ever was about anything in his life when he makes the statement seriously that the committee has disposed of all of the work that it will have to do for two years, as I understood him. That is not the fact.

Mr. MANN. Well, time will develop that.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Let it be the fact or not, I want to say to the gentleman that there is no purpose to bring in any resolution such as he suggests. Therefore he can vote to take away from me a little that I have.

Mr. MANN. I do not wish to take it away from the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MANN) there were—ayes 71, noes 22.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Speaker, I move the passage of the resolution.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Speaker, I have an amendment which I desire to offer.

The SPEAKER. The hour of the gentleman from Missouri is up.

Mr. CARLIN. My time is up; I can not yield.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman can not help himself; the gentleman from Missouri has a right to offer his amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri will offer his amendment.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Speaker, in line 9, page 2, after the word "janitor," add the words "and messenger."

Mr. CARLIN. I accept the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can not accept the amendment. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 9, after the word "janitor," add the words "and messenger."

Mr. BARTLETT. How will that read?

Mr. HAMLIN. I suggest the word "and" be left out and a hyphen be placed between the word "janitor" and the word "messenger" so there will be no doubt about it.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Speaker, I now move the passage of the resolution.

Mr. MANN. I suggest to the gentleman from Virginia he offer an amendment providing that the messenger to the Committee on Disposition of Useless Papers be appointed by the chairman.

Mr. CARLIN. That is covered by the rule.

Mr. MANN. I guess that is covered by the rule.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia has no time to yield to anybody.

Mr. CARLIN. I had been recognized and was moving the passage of the resolution.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word, and I do that, I will say frankly, to get about one minute's time.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Speaker, I thought I had recognition for the motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman was mistaken. The gentleman from Missouri moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I want to say I believe, so far as I know, the committee of which I am chairman has performed substantially all the work it will do during this session. We have no clerk, and never expect one; I am going on without any, and I now appeal to the committee in the interest of economy to look over the field and see how many of the other committees might get along like my own without a clerk. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

The question was taken, and the resolution as amended was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. CARLIN, a motion to reconsider the vote was laid on the table.

ATTENDANT IN LADIES' RECEPTION ROOM.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have the privilege of detaining the House about three minutes longer in presenting two little resolutions.

Mr. MANN. We will give you five minutes, and at the end of the five minutes I will make the point of order of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 94 (H. Rept. 27).

Resolved, That there shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, for the services of an attendant in the ladies' reception room, compensation at the rate of $75 per month from and including April 4, 1911, and during the sessions of the Sixty-second Congress, said attendant to be under charge of the Doorkeeper of the House.

Mr. LLOYD. I yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER].

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I do not think it necessary to explain this resolution to the House——

Mr. MANN. Do not try to do so, then. Has it been the custom to pay this $75?

Mr. GARNER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Then let us have a vote on the resolution.

Mr. GARNER. It has always been the custom to pay $75 a month.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

STENOGRAPHER FOR COMMITTEE ON WAR CLAIMS.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I also offer the following resolution from the Committee on Accounts.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 116 (H. Rept. 28).

Resolved, That there shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, for the services of a stenographer to the Committee on War Claims during the sessions of the Sixty-second Congress, compensation at the rate of $75 per month, payment to commence from the time said stenographer entered upon the discharge of his duties, which shall be ascertained and evidenced by the chairman of said committee.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to inquire of the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee, who is chairman of the Committee on War Claims, whether his committee is now engaged at work and actually needs the services of this additional stenographer?

Mr. LLOYD. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS].

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I will be very glad to answer that. There were 3,280 bills introduced before that committee last session, 288 resolutions, and 112 court findings. Now, it has been six years since an omnibus bill was passed in this House, or in the Senate either, to pay court findings. They have accumulated until the claimants are needy, and everybody who ever had one is writing in reference to it, and it is just one continued sluice of correspondence. There never was a time in the history of that committee when a stenographer was worse needed than now.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman say he needs the stenographer for committee work? I do not think he is entitled to one for mere correspondence.

Mr. SIMS. It is committee work, Mr. Speaker, and I have to refer letters to the departments all the time in order to get reports on bills now being introduced. It is absolutely committee work and no other sort.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, here is an additional employee. The committee is not at work, and I understand the committee has no intention of working.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman is mistaken in his understanding. The committee will not report a bill, perhaps, but the committee will be at work all the time during the extra session, and the chairman is at it now day and night.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Is this a new employee?

Mr. SIMS. No; this is the usual employee.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. LLOYD, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the two preceding resolutions were agreed to was laid on the table.

ADJOURNMENT UNTIL FRIDAY.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourns to meet on Friday next.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama moves that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourns to meet on Friday next.

Mr. MANN. That does away with Calendar Wednesday.

The motion was agreed to.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE.

Mr. PARRAN, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence for one week, on account of illness.

Mr. DOREMUS, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence for two weeks, on account of important business.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. GILLETT, by unanimous consent, was granted leave to withdraw from the files of the House papers in the case of the bill (H. R. 10962, 60th Cong.) for the relief of Henry N. Penfield (Committee on Military Affairs), no adverse report having been made thereon.

Mr. RAUCH, by unanimous consent, was granted leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of Paul L. Bahr (Committee on Military Affairs), Sixty-first Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.), under the order heretofore agreed to, the House adjourned until Friday, May 12, 1911, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the chief clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings filed by the court in the case of Sarah A. Bodkin, widow of William H. Bodkin, v. The United States (H. Doc. No. 47); to the Committee on War Claims and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the chief clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings filed by the court in the case of J. B. Carter, administrator of estate of Catherine Hopson v. The United States (H. Doc. No. 48); to the Committee on War Claims and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. LA FOLLETTE: A bill (H. R. 9239) to provide for the erection of a public building in the city of Ellensburg, in the State of Washington; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9240) to erect a public building in the city of Wenatchee, in the State of Washington; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9241) to provide for the acquisition of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Colfax, Wash.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. HAMILL: A bill (H. R. 9242) to provide for the retirement of employees in the civil service; to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service.

By Mr. MANN: A bill (H. R. 9243) to prevent cruelty to poultry when transported from one State or Territory or the District of Columbia into or through another State or Territory or the District of Columbia in any vessel or vehicle of any description operated by a common carrier; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. ANTHONY: A bill (H. R. 9244) to regulate service on the General Staff of the United States Army; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. FORNES: A bill (H. R. 9245) to amend section 657 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. DE FOREST: A bill (H. R. 9246) to authorize the extension of Colorado Avenue NW. from its present terminus north of Madison Street to Piney Branch Road; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. SHERWOOD: A bill (H. R. 9247) to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1912, and for other purposes," and to establish a board of pension appeals, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Appropriations.

By Mr. STEPHENS of Texas: A bill (H. R. 9248) to amend section 715 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. SABATH: A bill (H. R. 9249) to regulate accommodations on sleeping cars on the lines of interstate carriers; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL: A bill (H. R. 9250) to provide for the erection of a post office in the city of Syracuse, State of New York; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9251) for the purchase of a site for a public building in the city of Oneida, N. Y.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9252) for relief of former members of New York Infantry Volunteers; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. EDWARDS: A bill (H. R. 9253) requiring statistics from cotton speculators and manufacturers; to the Committee on the Census.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, May 11, 1911.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Ulysses G. B. Pierce, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Tuesday last was read and approved.

RULINGS OF THE POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Postmaster General, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 10th ultimo, certain information relative to the ruling of the Postmaster General and reasons therefor in the case of the Harpoon and the Woman's National Weekly.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask that the communication be printed and lie on the table subject to call.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be printed (S. Doc. No. 26), and at the request of the Senator from Arkansas it will lie on the table, without objection. No objection is heard.

Mr. DAVIS. I give notice that two weeks from to-day I will submit some observations on the report.

The VICE PRESIDENT. After the routine morning business?

Mr. DAVIS. After the routine morning business.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented resolutions adopted by the Central Labor Union of Newport News, Va., favoring the enactment of legislation to prohibit the imposing of the so-called "third degree" on any prisoner in the United States, which were referred to the Committee to Investigate the Administration of Criminal Laws by Federal Officers.

He also presented petitions of the Oak Grove Sunday School, of Roanoke County, Va.; of the Sunday school and church of the Germantown congregation of Wirtz, Va.; of the Sunday school of Johnsville, Va.; of the congregation of the Christiansburg Church, of Montgomery County, Va.; of the Sunday school of Topeco, Va.; of the congregation of the Oakvale Church, of Oakvale, W. Va.; and of the congregation of the Church of the Brethren (Dunkers), of Oakley, Ill., praying for the enactment of legislation for the suppression of the opium evil, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented resolutions adopted at the annual general conference of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, at Lamoni, Iowa, praying for the ratification of the treaty of arbitration between the United States and Great Britain, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. KERN presented memorials of sundry citizens of Warrick County, Ind., remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed reciprocal trade agreement between the United States and Canada, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey presented memorials of James P. Toole, of Paterson; William Dunworth, of Newark; and George McPartland, Patrick McPartland, and Hugh Montague, of Passaic, all in the State of New Jersey, remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed treaty of arbitration between the United States and Great Britain, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented petitions of Washington Camp, No. 126, Patriotic Order Sons of America, of Pleasantville; of Washington Camp, No. 139, Patriotic Order Sons of America, of Columbus; and of Union Council, No. 31, Junior Order United American Mechanics, of Rahway, all in the State of New Jersey, praying for the enactment of legislation to further restrict immigration, which were referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also presented a petition of the Mercer County Central Labor Union, of New Jersey, praying that an investigation be made into the alleged abduction from Indianapolis, Ind., of John J. McNamara, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. I present a joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Colorado, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senate joint memorial 35.

To the Congress of the United States of America:

Whereas numerous volunteer regiments who enlisted for the War with Spain in 1898 that were sent to the Philippine Islands and did valiant service there, suppressing the Philippine insurrection after the treaty of peace with Spain was signed, were returned to the United States and mustered out without being paid the customary travel pay allowed under similar conditions.

Therefore, your memorialists, the Legislative Assembly of the State of Colorado, earnestly pray your honorable body to enact into law a bill for the purpose of giving travel pay to all volunteer soldiers who remained in the Philippine Islands, doing service after the treaty of peace with Spain was signed, and who have heretofore not obtained same.

Resolved, That a copy of this memorial be forwarded to the Colorado Representatives in the Congress of the United States.

STEPHEN R. FITZGARRALD,
President of the Senate.
GEORGE MCLACHLAN,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Approved, May 3, 1911.

JOHN F. SHAFROTH,
Governor of the State of Colorado.

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. I present senate memorial No. 12, adopted by the Colorado State Senate, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

There being no objection, the memorial was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senate memorial 12.

To the Congress of the United States of America:

We, your memorialists, recognizing the grave danger with which one of Colorado's leading agricultural industries is threatened, urge upon you careful consideration of what is here set forth, so that you may make provision for protective measures which the importance of the matter in question warrants. Colorado now devotes approximately 700,000 acres to the growing of alfalfa and hay, and of this far the larger proportion is in alfalfa. The total production during 1910 was 1,400,000 tons, with a valuation of $15,120,000. Practically all of this acreage and production lies in the irrigated sections of the State, and the value of the land on which this remarkable production is possible will come close to $80,000,000. From these figures it becomes apparent that the alfalfa crop of Colorado is fast becoming, if it has not already become, the backbone of our agricultural system.

It is the basis to-day of crop rotation in the richest sections of the State, and its failure from any cause would be one of the direst calamities that could fall upon the agriculturists of Colorado.

Advices received from the Bureau of Entomology and from a recent bulletin issued by the experiment station of our sister and neighboring State Utah, gives us fair warning that the alfalfa industry is greatly endangered by the presence of a most destructive insect pest.

The alfalfa-leaf weevil is stated in the report of the Chief of the Bureau of Entomology, United States Department of Agriculture, to constitute a great menace to alfalfa culture, and an appropriation of $10,000 for investigation of the pest has been requested. In the bulletin issued by Utah the means of spread of this alfalfa pest are discussed, and the prediction is made that it would probably be a question of but a short time before the insect will be generally distributed over the alfalfa-growing regions of the United States.

Alfalfa growing in Colorado is so important that the expenditure of the amount in question could not possibly cover the work of checking the spread of the pest should it gain any headway in Colorado.

The State is menaced by its nearness to the State of Utah, for there is a constant interchange of goods between the two States, and unquestionably the State of Colorado must suffer if no steps are taken to see that shipments are properly guarded from carrying the adult weevil from one section to another. It is imperative that steps be taken in the near future to properly supervise shipments in which there may be a menace to Colorado's great industry.

The steps that should be taken to hinder the spread of the alfalfa weevil are, to a large extent, protective to all alfalfa-growing sections in the United States, and your memorialists believe that it is a matter of national importance that every reasonable effort be made to protect us against the spread of this pest.

We therefore respectfully urge that in addition to appropriating the sum of $10,000 for investigating the alfalfa weevil, as requested by the Chief of the Bureau of Entomology, there be appropriated the sum of $25,000 for the purpose of devising means to check the spread of the pest, and for practical work in locating and exterminating incipient isolated colonies of the alfalfa weevil.

And we further urge that this fund be used in cooperating with common carriers, with agricultural colleges, and by every other means which can be devised to prevent the calamity of a destruction of one of our greatest industries.

STEPHEN R. FITZGARALD,
President of the Senate.

Approved April 26, 1911.

JOHN F. SHAFROTH,
Governor of the State of Colorado.

Mr. LIPPITT presented memorials of sundry citizens of Warwick and Pawtucket, R. I., remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed treaty of arbitration between the United States and Great Britain, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. NIXON presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Tonopah, Nev., remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed treaty of arbitration between the United States and Great Britain, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Fallon, Nev., praying that United States troops be withdrawn from the Mexican border, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. SHIVELY presented a petition of Eureka Lodge, No. 14, Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen, of Indianapolis, Ind., praying that an investigation be made into the alleged abduction of John J. McNamara from Indianapolis, Ind., which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I present a resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of New York, recommending the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution providing for the election of United States Senators by direct vote of the people. I ask that the resolution lie on the table and be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATE OF NEW YORK, IN SENATE,
Albany, April 20, 1911.

Whereas the election of United States Senators by direct vote of the people themselves will increase proper confidence in and respect for the upper House of the National Legislature:

Resolved (if the assembly concur), That the legislature respectfully requests the Senators and Representatives in Congress from this State to use their best endeavors, at the present session, for the adoption of a resolution to submit to the legislatures of the several States an amendment to the Constitution of the United States providing for the election of United States Senators in the several States by the direct vote of the people.

By order of the Senate.

PATRICK E. MCCABE, Clerk.

In assembly, April 25, 1911. Concurred in without amendment.

LUKE MCHENRY, Clerk.

Mr. O'GORMAN presented memorials of the Sinn Fein Club, of New York City, and of sundry citizens of Mechanicsville, New York City, Niagara Falls, and Manhattan, all in the State of New York, remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed treaty of arbitration between the United States and Great Britain, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a memorial of Lake City Lodge, No. 324, International Association of Machinists, of Dunkirk, N. Y., and memorials of sundry citizens of New York, remonstrating against the adoption of the Taylor system of shop management by the Government in navy yards and arsenals, which were referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also presented a petition of Local Union No. 491, United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners, of Corinth, N. Y., praying for the repeal of the present oleomargarine law, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented a petition of the New York Mercantile Exchange, praying that an investigation be made by the Department of Agriculture relative to the condition of frozen and dried eggs, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented a memorial of the Onondaga County Bar Association, of New York, remonstrating against dividing the northern district of the United States district court of New York into two districts, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of Local Camp No. 28, Patriotic Order Sons of America, of Wappingers Falls, N. Y., praying for the enactment of legislation to further restrict immigration, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I present memorials said to be signed by 30,000 voters of Michigan, sent out under the auspices of the Michigan State Grange to various points in Michigan on town-meeting day, protesting against the adoption of the reciprocity agreement with Canada. I ask that one of the memorials, without the names, be read.

There being no objection, the memorial was read, as follows:

To the honorable Members of the Senate and House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

We, the undersigned citizens of Michigan, residents of Branch County, do hereby petition your honorable body, protesting against the adoption of the reciprocity agreement with Canada, and hereby agree that we will never support any man for office who works or votes for its passage.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The memorials will be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. PENROSE presented memorials of sundry citizens of Pittsburg, Wilmerding, Shenandoah, Philadelphia, Pittston, Heckscherville, Lost Creek, Braddock, North Braddock, Wall, Portvue, McKeesport, Bellevue, Munhall, and Homestead, all in the State of Pennsylvania, remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed treaty of arbitration between the United States and Great Britain, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. WARREN presented the memorial of John H. Malin, president-secretary of the International Brotherhood of Pulp, Sulphite, and Paper Mill Workers, of Albany, N. Y., remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed reciprocal trade agreement between the United States and Canada, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. McLEAN presented memorials of Frank Kasper, of Bridgeport; Fred C. Mullins, of Bridgeport; and sundry citizens of Bridgeport and New Haven, all in the State of Connecticut, remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed treaty of arbitration between the United States and Great Britain, which were referred to the Commitee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. PAGE presented a memorial of the congregation of the Jamaica Church of Seventh-Day Adventists, of Jamaica, Vt., and a memorial of the congregation of the Hartland Church of Seventh-Day Adventists, of Hartland, Vt., remonstrating against the observance of Sunday as a day of rest in the District of Columbia, which were referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also presented a memorial of Grand View Grange, Patrons of Husbandry, of Addison, Vt., remonstrating against the passage of the so-called cold-storage bill, which was referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. NELSON, from the Committee on Territories, to which was referred the bill (S. 267) providing for assisting indigent persons, other than natives, in the District of Alaska, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which was referred the bill (S. 12) to give effect to the provisions of a treaty between the United States and Great Britain concerning the fisheries in waters contiguous to the United States and the Dominion of Canada, signed at Washington on April 1, 1908, and ratified by the United States Senate April 13, 1908, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 22) thereon.

HANDBOOK OF AMERICAN INDIANS.

Mr. SMOOT, from the Committee on Printing, reported the following concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 2), and it was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 3,500 copies of Bulletin No. 30, in two parts, of the Bureau of American Ethnology, entitled "Handbook of American Indians," of which 1,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate, 2,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 500 copies for the use of the Bureau of American Ethnology.

DONATION OF CONDEMNED CANNON.

Mr. DU PONT. From the Committee on Military Affairs I report back with an amendment the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 11) authorizing the Secretary of War to deliver a condemned cannon to the National Encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic, and I submit a report (No. 21) thereon. I ask for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment was, in line 5, before the word "dismounted," to strike out "one" and insert "two," so as to make the joint resolution read:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to deliver to the order of Cola D. R. Stowits, quartermaster general of the Grand Army of the Republic, two dismounted, condemned bronze cannon used in the Civil War, to be used by the Grand Army of the Republic for the purpose of furnishing official badges of the order: Provided, That no expense shall be caused to the United States through the delivery of said condemned cannon.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read:

A joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to deliver two condemned cannon to the Grand Army of the Republic.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

RECIPROCITY WITH CANADA.

Mr. WATSON submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 4412) to promote reciprocal trade relations with the Dominion of Canada, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed.

Mr. OLIVER submitted three amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 4412) to promote reciprocal trade relations with the Dominion of Canada, and for other purposes, which were referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed.

PAYMASTER JOHN W. MORSE, UNITED STATES NAVY.

Mr. LODGE submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $46,491.95 in settlement of the accounts of Paymaster John W. Morse, United States Navy, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS—LENA D. NICKERSON.

On motion of Mr. BURTON, it was Ordered, That Lena D. Nickerson be authorized to withdraw from the files of the Senate the papers in the case of Lena D. Nickerson (S. 8315, 61st Cong.), no adverse report having been made thereon.

SOUTHERN APPALACHIAN AND WHITE MOUNTAINS.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the printing of 1,000 copies of Senate document No. 91, Sixtieth Congress, first session, being the report of the Secretary of Agriculture on the Southern Appalachian and White Mountain Watershed, with the map, for the use of the Senate document room.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The order is entered without objection.

POLICE AND FIREMEN'S PENSION FUND.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have some data prepared by Gen. John A. Johnston, Commissioner of the District of Columbia, in the matter of policemen and firemen's pension funds embodied in Senate bill No. 2047. It is an important matter, which is now before the Committee on the District of Columbia. I move that the memorandum be printed as a document (S. Doc. No. 24) and referred to that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

PROPAGANDA AGAINST CANADIAN RECIPROCITY.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD a clipping from the New York Herald of the day before yesterday. It is an interesting paper. It states that there are some master men, namely, a law firm—the firm of Allen & Graham, No. 11 William Street, New York—who are managing the fight now being made against the reciprocity agreement, and that they are particularly assuming to marshal and direct the granger forces. William Street, it will be recalled, is not very far from Wall Street. So the office of this firm, according to this article, is the headquarters of this movement. I will read just a little of the article:

Mr. Graham—

A member of this firm—

at the head of a force of writers and stenographers, is sending broadcast literature telling the farmers they will be ruined by reciprocity. Subscriptions are solicited for this propaganda. Manufacturers as well as farmers are asked to contribute, although the Grange has been making it appear that it was working independently of politicians or manufacturers.

Mr. Allen, the other member of the firm, watches the legislative end in Washington. He is understood to be an expert in legislation. If he were working for a trust, he might be known as a lobbyist.

* * * * * * *

Up to date they have sent 8,000 copies of the Canadian agreement to the various masters of the National Grange under Senator GALLINGER'S frank.

I ask leave to have the article inserted in the RECORD.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, before leave to do that is given I want to suggest to the Senator that Wall Street has nothing to do with this matter at all. I did furnish to the master of the National Grange copies of the President's reciprocity message, which I had a right to do, as I understand it. The firm referred to has business relations with the National Grange, and they have an entire right to do what they are now doing. I think, instead of inserting the article in the RECORD, it should be referred to the Committee on Finance for consideration and investigation, if need be; and I make that motion.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I have no objection whatever to that course. Moreover, I would be glad to have these attorneys brought as witnesses before the Finance Committee. I wish, however, to say to the Senator from New Hampshire that when I spoke of Wall Street I did not have the Senator from New Hampshire at all in mind.

Mr. GALLINGER. I understood that.

Mr. STONE. I was simply a little curious to know how the headquarters of this farmers' movement was located on the edge of Wall Street.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; I understood the Senator's suggestion to be a geographical one. The location has no significance, however. I move the reference of the article to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. STONE. Let it go there by consent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LODGE in the chair). The Senator from New Hampshire moves that the article be referred to the Committee on Finance. Without objection, it is so ordered.

AFFAIRS IN MEXICO.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, on the 20th of April last I introduced a resolution expressing the sense of the Senate that the United States ought not to intervene in the present revolution in Mexico. That resolution, on my motion, was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and is still pending in that committee. I ask that the resolution be printed in the RECORD of to-day, and following it that there shall be printed a short brief of authorities which I have caused to be prepared showing the uniform course of the United States of nonintervention in controversies such as this.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, may I suggest that it would be more useful if the brief to which the Senator refers should be printed as a public document rather than in the RECORD.

Mr. CULBERSON. I will ask leave that it also be printed as a Senate document.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas asks unanimous consent that the paper which he sends to the desk may be printed in the RECORD, together with the resolution, and also be printed as a public document (S. Doc. No. 25). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The papers referred to are as follows:

AFFAIRS IN MEXICO.

BRIEF IN SUPPORT OF SENATE RESOLUTION OF APRIL 20, 1911, RELATIVE TO INTERVENTION IN AFFAIRS IN MEXICO.

[S. Res. 21, Sixty-second Congress, first session.]

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate: First. That intervention by the United States in the existing revolution in Mexico would be without justification and contrary to the settled principles of this Government of noninterference in the domestic concerns of other countries;

Second. That the extent to which the United States should go in the present emergency in Mexico is to enforce their neutrality laws with vigor and fully protect life and property within their limits along the Mexican boundary line. The rights of citizens of the United States residing in Mexico are those of neutrals in belligerent territory.

INTERVENTION.

Intervention takes place when a State interferes in the relations of two other States without the consent of both or either of them, or when it interferes in the domestic affairs of another State, irrespectively of the will of the latter, for the purpose of either altering or maintaining the actual condition of things within it. Prima facie intervention is a hostile act, because it constitutes an attack upon the independence of the State subjected to it. Nevertheless, its position in law is somewhat equivocal. Regarded from the point of view of the State intruded upon, it must always remain an act which, if not consented to, is an act of war. But from the point of view of the intervening power it is not a means of obtaining redress for a wrong done, but a measure of prevention or of police, undertaken sometimes for the express purpose of avoiding war. * * * Hence, although intervention often ends in war and is sometimes really war from the commencement, it may be conveniently considered abstractedly from the pacific or belligerent character which it assumes in different cases. (Hall, Int. Law, 5th ed., 284.)

Generally speaking, the writers on international law assign the following causes as grounds for intervention: 1. Intervention in restraint of wrongdoing (a) against illegal acts, (b) against immoral acts. 2. Intervention under a treaty of guaranty. 3. Intervention by invitation of a party to a civil war. 4. Intervention under the authority of the body of the States. (Hall, Int. Law, 5th ed., 285–296.)

With the single exception of its intervention in Cuba in 1898, by virtue of the joint resolution of Congress of April 28, 1898, which resulted in the Spanish War, it has been the uniform policy of this Government to decline to intervene either in conflicts between two or more States or in domestic insurrections or revolts in a State, upon any of the grounds assigned. The battleship Maine was destroyed February 15, 1898, in Habana Harbor.

Thus the United States expressed its sympathy with the Greek insurrection against Turkey, but there was no intervention. In this instance Great Britain, France, and Russia did intervene: (1) To comply with the request of one of the parties; (2) on the ground of humanity; (3) to put a stop to piracy and anarchy.

Mr. Macon, from the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate, January 16, 1826, referring to the nomination by the President of envoys to the Assembly of American Nations at Panama, said:

"By the principles of this policy, inculcated by our wisest statesmen in former days and approved by the experience of all subsequent time, the true interest of the United States was supposed to be promoted by avoiding all entangling connections with any other nation whatsoever." (Moore, Dig. Int. Law, VI, 14.)

Mr. Clay, Secretary of State, in a note to Mr. Revenga, January 30, 1828, said:

"The Government of the United States scrupulously refrains from taking part in the internal dissensions in foreign States, whether in the Old World or the New." (Ib., 14.)

Mr. Van Buren, Secretary of State, in a note to Mr. Moore, minister to Colombia, June 9, 1829, said:

"The President desires that you should not identify yourself with the feelings or objects of either of the contending parties. It is the ancient and well-settled policy of this Government not to interfere with the internal concerns of any foreign country. However deeply the President might regret changes in the Governments of neighboring American States, which he might deem inconsistent with those free and liberal principles which lie at the foundation of our own, he would not, on that account, advise or countenance a departure from this policy."

On October 16, 1829, in a note to Mr. Butler, minister to Mexico, Mr. Van Buren, Secretary of State, said:

"An invariable and strict neutrality between belligerents and an entire abstinence from all interference in the concerns of other nations are cardinal traits of the foreign policy of this Government."

On October 15, 1830, Mr. Van Buren, Secretary of State, wrote Mr. Hamm, chargé d'affaires to Chile:

"One of the settled principles of this Government is that of noninterference in the domestic concerns of nations. (Ib., 15.)

"In proclaiming and adhering to the doctrine of neutrality and nonintervention, the United States have not followed the lead of other civilized nations. They have taken the lead themselves and have been followed by others." (President Fillmore, Annual Message, Dec. 2, 1851 (Mr. Webster, Secretary of State), Richardson's Messages, V, 116.)

Mr. Cass, Secretary of State, in a note to Mr. McLane, minister to Mexico, March 7, 1859, said:

"No matter how strongly the sympathies of the United States may be with the liberal constitutional party in Mexico, our Government can not properly intervene in its behalf without violating a cardinal principle of our foreign policy."

Mr. Seward, Secretary of State, writing to Mr. Dayton, minister to France, on May 11, 1863, with reference to an invitation to France to cooperate with the governments of Paris, London, and Vienna in the exercise of a moral influence with the Emperor of Russia with reference to the affairs of Poland, after expressing due appreciation of the invitation, declined it, saying, among other things:

"Since that period occasions have frequently happened which presented seductions to a departure from what, superficially viewed, seemed a course of isolation and indifference. It is scarcely necessary to recur to them. One was an invitation to a Congress of newly emancipated Spanish-American States; another an urgent appeal to aid Hungary in a revolution aiming at the restoration of her ancient and illustrious independence; another, the project of a joint guaranty of Cuba to Spain in concurrence with France and Great Britain; and more recently, an invitation to a cooperative demonstration with Spain, France, and Great Britain in Mexico; and, later still, suggestions by some of the Spanish-American States for a common council of the republican States situated upon the American Continent. These suggestions were successively disallowed by the Government, and its decision was approved in each case by the deliberate judgment of the American people. Our policy of nonintervention—straight, absolute, and peculiar as it may seem to other nations—has thus become a traditional one, which could not be abandoned without the most urgent occasion, amounting to a manifest necessity." (Moore, Dig. Int. Law, VI, 23.)

"It is against the policy of the United States to interfere in contests between the titular Government of Haiti and the insurgents." (Mr. Fish, Secretary of State, to Mr. Bassett, minister to Haiti, October 31, 1869, ib., p. 26.)

Mr. Bayard, Secretary of State, writing to Mr. Whitney, Secretary of the Navy, April 15, 1885, said:

"At Cartagena, as at any other point in Colombia, not on the direct line of isthmian transit, the only question presented for our consideration is the general one of the protection of the lives and property of citizens of the United States established there. Our right in this respect is, of course, neither more nor less than that of any other Government whose citizens or subjects may be found at such points under similar circumstances. Interests of other nationalities than our own are understood to exist at Cartagena. Consequently, no measure could be taken by the forces of the United States for the protection of their citizens there which we would not admit the perfect right of another Government—that of England, France, or Germany, for instance—to employ for the like protection of its subjects.

"Generally speaking, persons who quit the shelter of their own flag to take up a voluntary residence in a foreign land do so at their own risk and subject to the vicissitudes of foreign invasion or domestic insurrection in the country where they cast their lot, in common with the natives thereof. Their own Government could not invade the country of their sojourn there to protect them from the consequences of war from without or from within without committing a distinctly hostile act. Their rights are simply those of neutrals in a belligerent territory.

"But where the place of their sojourn is a port open to the world's commerce, to which foreign vessels have a right to resort, the presence of war vessels of their nation is proper to protect the national shipping in port and the lives and property of neutral citizens on shore from any injurious treatment contrary to the received international rules of warfare. Such war vessels may properly afford asylum to our own noncombatant citizens and moral protection to their interests within the limits of legitimate warfare, and extreme cases may be conceived where the extreme law of self-preservation may require more effective measures if the bounds of legitimate warfare be overpassed. In no event, however, should such measures amount to an intervention in the domestic disturbances of that country by aiding one belligerent against the other." (Ib., 29.)

In his annual message of December 5, 1899, President McKinley said:

"This Government has maintained an attitude of neutrality in the unfortunate contest between Great Britain and the Boer States of Africa. We have remained faithful to the precept of avoiding entangling alliances as to affairs not of our direct concern."

In a letter to Mr. Hunter, minister to Guatemala, Mr. Day, Secretary of State, September 16, 1898, said:

"The rule of this Government is to observe the most absolute impartiality in respect to questions arising between its neighbors; to refrain from forming a judgment upon the merits of the mutual recriminations which may attend such disputes; to abstain from advising either party to the difference; and to exert mediatorial offices only when acceptable to both parties. * * *

"This Government, as the impartial friend of both Guatemala and Mexico, can not but deplore the tension which has arisen between them, and were the way open for our friendly action in a manner equally acceptable to both of them we would gladly do what we properly might, in the same spirit of impartiality, to induce a friendly composition of their differences." (Ib., 30–31.)

In a letter to Mr. Trescott, special agent to Peru and Chile, January 9, 1882, Mr. Frelinghuysen, Secretary of State, said:

"Were the United States to assume an attitude of dictation toward the South American Republics, even for the purpose of preventing war, the greatest of evils, or to preserve the autonomy of nations, it must be prepared by Army and Navy to enforce its mandate, and to this end tax our people for the exclusive benefit of foreign nations."

In a letter of February 24, 1882, the Secretary of State wrote Mr. Trescott:

"On the other hand, he (the President) remains convinced that the United States has no right which is conferred either by treaty stipulations or by public law to impose upon the belligerents, unasked, its views of a just settlement, and it has no interests at stake commensurate with the evils that might follow an interference, which would authorize it to interpose between these parties, further than warranted by treaties, by public law, or by the voluntary acts of both parties."

During the Ten Years' War in Cuba (1868–1878) many and repeated protests were made to the Government of Spain, some involving the atrocious manner in which the war was conducted, and others complaining of the treatment of American citizens there and the destruction of their property, and others demanding protection for such citizens and such property. In no instance, however, does any idea of armed intervention appear. In 1875 the United States sought the good offices of the English, French, German, Russian, Austrian, and Italian Governments to end the war, but nothing appears to have come of this.

The general principle applicable to alien residents of a country in a state of insurrection, as laid down by Wharton, is this:

"A sovereign is not ordinarily responsible to alien residents for injuries they receive on his territory from belligerent action, or from insurgents whom he could not control, or whom the claimant Government had recognized as belligerents." (Wharton, Int. Law Dig., II, 576.)

Mr. Bayard, in a letter to Mr. Sutphen in January, 1888, discussing a claim against Spain for the destruction of the property of an American citizen in Cuba by insurrectionists, stated that the rule adopted by this Government with reference to such claims was that it was not within the power of the Government to prevent such destruction of property and that therefore it was not liable.

Mr. Olney, writing to Mr. Thompson, minister to Brazil, in 1896, in regard to the destruction of the property of an American citizen destroyed in the course of a battle between the Brazilian Government and insurgents, stated:

"It is a principle of public law too well settled to require the citation of authorities that a sovereign is not responsible for injuries done to alien residents by insurgents whom he can not control."

When in 1896 it was reported that the Cuban insurgents had threatened to destroy the works of an American iron company, Mr. Olney made prompt representations to the Spanish Government and asked protection of the property, which was given. So, in 1897, protection was asked of the Spanish Government for another American iron company, and assurances were promptly given by the Spanish Government.

With reference to a telegram from the American minister at Caracas, indicating a probable attack by pillagers on the property of an American corporation at Bermudez Lake, in Venezuela, Mr. Hay, on December 28, 1900, expressed to the Secretary of the Navy that the minister's request for a vessel should be granted, and that the gunboat should also protect all existing rights and maintain the status quo pending an investigation and decision as to an attempt which was alleged then to be in contemplation to deprive the company of its property by executive action. (Moore, Int. Law, 258.)

While writers upon international law seem to be in practical accord upon the proposition that alien residents of a state stand upon precisely the same footing as native inhabitants with regard to injuries to their persons or property inflicted during insurrection or civil war, within the limits set by the usage of war, this principle of course does not apply when the act from which the foreigners have suffered is directed against them as such, in contradistinction to neutral natives.

Pradier-Fodéré, in his treaties on international public law, citing Calvo (who appears to rank as perhaps the leading authority) and other text writers, after laying down the proposition supra, adds:

"These considerations apply, however, only to states which are capable of fulfilling their international obligations. When, on the contrary, the state which is engaged in civil war no longer offers a guaranty of power capable of making itself obeyed, when the circumstances of the contest and the loosening of passions render impossible the performance of the duty of protection toward foreigners, when the latter are menaced with becoming the victims of the violence of an excited populace, respect for the right of sovereignty and jurisdiction ought not to prevent foreign states from caring for the safety of their citizens. 'The state whose subjects inhabit the territory where civil war prevails is under an obligation to protect its citizens abroad, and the dangers to which they are exposed in consequence of revolution and civil war increase those obligations instead of diminishing them. So long as it may hope for and obtain from the state which is involved in civil war or in revolution an efficacious protection, it contents itself with diplomatic measures; when those measures become insufficient it takes such measures as may be necessary itself to protect its nationals; it masses troops on the frontier and sends its fleets to cruise along the coasts, in order to punish infractions of the law of nations or to gather up its subjects in case of need. The state which is involved in civil war is bound to permit this protection and can not see in it an act of war, if it is incapable of discharging itself the duties of protection toward foreign subjects.'" (Moore, Dig. Int. Law, VI, 951–952.)

ERADICATION OF CATTLE TICKS IN ALABAMA.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 40), which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of Agriculture be directed to report to the Senate:

First. In what counties of Alabama have agents of the department been employed in directing or aiding in the eradication of ticks?

Second. How long have such agents been so employed in each county, and the total expense; and in what counties such work has ceased; and whether the cattle therein are now free from ticks?

Third. The names of such agents now employed in each county, from what State appointed, the salary, compensation, and expenses allowed to each of such agents.

BUSINESS OF THE SESSION.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I submit the resolution which I send to the desk. I wish to say in connection with the resolution that we see in the newspapers various conjectures as to the action of this body with reference to legislation, and the statement is made as to this body that there will be an adjournment immediately after action upon the reciprocity bill. There are a great many questions regarding which public opinion is made up and with reference to which legislation is demanded by the people of the United States. I have, therefore, presented these questions in this resolution as worthy of the consideration of the Senate at this extraordinary session: First, covering those questions that should be acted upon in legislation, and, second, covering those questions which should be considered by the various committees of the Senate with a view to preparing legislation to be presented to the Senate at the regular session. I ask that the resolution be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 41), as follows:

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that during the extra session legislation should be enacted upon the following subjects:

(1) The Canadian reciprocity bill.

(2) Enlarging the free list of importations.

(3) The reduction of the excessive duties in the wool, cotton, and steel schedules.

(4) The gradual reduction of all duties of a prohibitory character to a revenue basis.

(5) The immediate reduction of the appropriations for military and naval expenses for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1912, to the extent of $30,000,000, such reduction to be apportioned by the President with the aid of a military board or boards.

(6) A graduated increase in the corporation tax sufficient to make up any deficit caused by a reduction in custom duties and also sufficient to provide a fund for the regulation of river flow and the promotion of river navigation.

(7) Publicity of campaign expenditures before the election and prohibiting contributions by corporations.

(8) Providing for the election of United States Senators by popular vote.

(9) Providing for the immediate admission of Arizona and New Mexico as separate States.

And that during the extra session the proper committees should consider and report for action, during the next regular session, legislation upon the following subjects:

(1) Providing for the physical valuation and the control of the stock and bond issues of railroads engaged in interstate commerce.

(2) Providing, in connection with the Bureau of Corporations, for a board of interstate trade with powers of examination, condemnation, and recommendation regarding interstate trade similar to those conferred upon the Interstate Commerce Commission regarding interstate transportation.

(3) Providing for the protection of bank depositors and the minimizing of bank panics by the organization of a national reserve association in each State, in which the national banks and the State banks engaged in interstate commerce shall be stockholders, such national reserve associations to have ample capital and reserves and to take over the note-issuing functions now enjoyed by the national banks, including the power to issue emergency currency; such associations to have the power to insure or guarantee the depositors of their constituent banks, and in connection therewith powers of examination of such banks; such associations to be brought into federation through a national banking board fairly representative of the different sections of the country, one-half of which shall be selected by such associations and one-half by the President of the United States; and such board to be advisory to the Congress and to the President.

(4) Providing for the neutralization of the Philippine Islands with a view to recognizing their independence as soon as a stable government can be established.

(5) Providing for the cooperation of the National Government with the States in devising and carrying out comprehensive plans for the regulation of river flow, with a view to the promotion of navigation and the prevention of destructive floods, through the preservation of forests, the storage and use of flood waters for the irrigation of arid lands, and the storage of flood waters for the development of water power, and providing a fund ample for continuous work, to be conducted under the direction of a board of experts authorized by law.

(6) Providing for the protection of our natural resources in timber, coal, iron, and oil against monopolistic control.

(7) Providing for the upbuilding of the American merchant marine by free entry to American registry of all ships, wherever constructed, and by the construction of auxiliary ships for our Navy, to be used in time of war in aid of the fighting ships and in time of peace in establishing new routes of commerce through lease to shipping companies; such legislation to involve the temporary diminution of the construction of fighting ships and the substitute of auxiliary ships, with a view to the creation of a well-proportioned and self-sustaining Navy.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I ask that the resolution lie on the table for the present, and I give notice that at the next session of the Senate I will address the Senate upon the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will lie on the table subject to call.

ELECTION OF PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, I move that the Senate now proceed to the choice of a President pro tempore, to preside over the Senate in the absence of the Vice President.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, I nominate the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] for President pro tempore of the Senate of the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois nominates the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] for President pro tempore of the Senate.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, on behalf of the Democratic side of the Chamber, I nominate the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] for the position of President pro tempore of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia nominates the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] for President pro tempore of the Senate.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I nominate the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] to be President pro tempore of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin nominates the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] to be President pro tempore of the Senate.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask that the roll be called.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois asks that the roll be called. Without objection, the Secretary will call the roll, and each Senator as his name is called will answer with the name of the Senator for whom he desires to vote as President pro tempore of the Senate. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BACON (when his name was called.) I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] and vote. I vote for the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN].

Mr. BORAH (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from California [Mr. WORKS]. If the Senator from California were present, I should vote for the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER].

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will state in that connection, if permissible under the rules, that if the Senator from California [Mr. WORKS] were present he would vote for the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP].

Mr. BROWN (when his name was called). On this question I have a pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. GAMBLE (when Mr. CRAWFORD's name was called). My colleague [Mr. CRAWFORD] is confined to his room by illness. For that reason he is not able to be present. I make this statement at his request.

Mr. DILLINGHAM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], which I transfer to the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON], and vote. I vote for the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER].

Mr. DIXON (when his name was called). On this vote I am paired with the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS]. If he were present I should vote for the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. The Senator from Iowa, I understand, if present would vote for the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP]. He being absent I withhold my vote.

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). Being interested in the question before the Senate, I ask unanimous consent to be excused from voting.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no objection, and the Senator from New Hampshire is excused.

Mr. KENYON (when his name was called). On this vote I have a pair with the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. BOURNE]. Were he present I should vote for the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], and I understand the Senator from Oregon if present would vote for the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP].

Mr. PERKINS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN]. If he were present he would vote for the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], and I should vote for the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER].

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. McCUMBER (after having voted for Mr. GALLINGER). I ask if the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. PERCY] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that the senior Senator from Mississippi has not voted.

Mr. McCUMBER. Then I withdraw my vote, as I have a general pair with that Senator.

The roll call resulted as follows:

FOR MR. BACON—35.

Bailey	Hitchcock	O'Gorman	Smith, S.C.
Bryan	Johnson, Me.	Owen	Stone
Chamberlain	Johnston, Ala.	Paynter	Swanson
Chilton	Kern	Pomerene	Taylor

NOT VOTING—18.

Bankhead	Crawford	Kenyon	Stephenson
Borah	Cummins	McCumber	Tillman
Bourne	Dixon	Overman	Works
Brown	Frye	Percy
Clarke, Ark.	Gallinger	Perkins

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy-three Senators have voted. Necessary to a choice, 37. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] has 35; the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] has 32; the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] has 4; the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW] has 1; and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] has 1. There is no choice.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate take another ballot.

Mr. STONE. Out in my country a plurality elects.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair does not think it does under the practice of Congress and the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask for another ballot.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois moves that the Senate proceed to another ballot.

Mr. BAILEY. I assume that that would be the procedure, without a motion. When the Senate enters upon the election of an officer it proceeds to ballot until one is elected, unless it is otherwise ordered.

Mr. CULLOM. I did not intend to make a motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks the point of the Senator from Texas is well taken. The Senate will proceed, unless another order is made, to another roll call. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BACON (when his name was called). Again announcing the transfer of my pair with the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] to the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], I vote for the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN].

Mr. BORAH (when his name was called). I again announce that I have a pair with the junior Senator from California [Mr. WORKS]. If he were present, I would vote for the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. I am informed that if he were present he would vote for the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP].

Mr. BROWN (when his name was called). I repeat my announcement heretofore made. I have a pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE], and I therefore withhold my vote. I will allow this statement to stand for the rest of the day.

Mr. DILLINGHAM (when his name was called). I again announce my general pair with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], which I transfer to the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON]. I make this announcement for the day to save repetition. I vote for the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER].

Mr. DIXON (when his name was called). I again announce that on this vote I am paired with the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS]. If he were present, I would vote for the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. He being absent, I withhold my vote. I am informed that he would, if present, vote for the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP].

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). Mr. President, observing that two other Senators nominated for this high office have voted, I vote for the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

Mr. KENYON (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. BOURNE]. If he were present, he would vote for the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP], and I would vote for the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER].

Mr. McCUMBER (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. PERCY]. If he were present, he would vote for the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], and I would vote for the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. I make this announcement for the day, and withhold my vote.

Mr. PERKINS (when his name was called). I again announce my general pair with the junior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN]. If he were present, he would vote for the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], and I would vote for the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER].

The roll call, having been concluded, resulted as follows:

FOR MR. BACON—35.

Brown	Frye	Perkins
Clarke, Ark.	Kenyon	Stephenson

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy-four Senators have voted; necessary to a choice, 38. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] has received 35; the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], 32; the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP], 4; the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], 1; the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], 1; and the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW], 1. There is no choice.

The Chair thinks it only proper to say that by an inadvertence which seems almost incredible he did not remember the second clause of Rule I of the Senate, and in pursuing the course that has been pursued here he has followed the proceeding which has always taken place in such a case since he has been in the Senate. The Vice President would leave the chair, calling a Senator to it, and in his absence, as the Constitution requires, the Senate would proceed to the election of a President pro tempore.

Under the second clause of Rule I of the Senate the present occupant of the chair has no right to occupy the chair. It must be occupied by the Secretary of the Senate, or in his absence by the Chief Clerk, unless the Senate chooses to suspend the rule, which, of course, it can do by unanimous consent.

Mr. BAILEY. I ask that the rule of the Senate in that respect shall be suspended by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas asks that the second clause of Rule I of the Senate, relating to the occupancy of the chair during the choice of a President pro tempore, shall be suspended. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Unless otherwise ordered, the Senate will proceed to a third vote for President pro tempore.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BORAH (when his name was called). I make the same announcement that I made before.

Mr. DIXON (when his name was called). I make the same statement regarding my pair that I made on the former two votes.

Mr. KENYON (when his name was called). I will state that I am paired with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. BOURNE].

Mr. McCUMBER (when his name was called). I repeat my previous announcement as to my pair.

Mr. PERKINS (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the junior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN]. If he were present, he would vote for Mr. BACON and I would vote for Mr. GALLINGER.

The roll call having been concluded, it resulted as follows:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On this vote 74 Senators have voted; necessary to a choice, 38. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] has 35 votes, the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] has 32 votes, the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] has 4 votes, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] has 1 vote, the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] 1, and the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW] 1. As there has been no choice, the Senate will proceed to another ballot.

Mr. DIXON. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BORAH (when his name was called). I make the same announcement that I made before.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I object to——

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order. The roll having begun to be called, it is out of order to interrupt it.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York.

Mr. ROOT. I object to the Senator from Idaho being excused from voting and ask that the rule of the Senate, Rule XII, be enforced.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I suggest that this is not a case within the rule of excusing a Senator from voting, but the vote is withheld in pursuance of a pair, a practice long sanctioned by the Senate; and in such a case a Senator does not need to be excused from voting.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks that as a pair is a reason for not voting under the rule, excusing a Senator from voting should be submitted to the Senate after the roll call and before the result is announced.

Mr. BAILEY. That makes it about as broad as it is long. If a pair is a sufficient reason for not voting, the announcement of the pair, of course, is a statement of the reason, the only difference being that the reason must be approved by the Senate. By the long, uniform, and unbroken practice of the Senate, a Senator is permitted to pair. And suppose a Senator were absent, either sick or upon the public business, and his pair sat here, obliged by every fair sense of obligation to respect that pair, does the Senate think it would have the power to compel him to break it?

Mr. President, the Senate could enter that kind of an order against me and I would defy it to the point of expulsion. If I had given a Senator my word that I would protect him in his absence, the Senate could not compel me to either break it or withdraw it.

I think the Senate will hesitate long before it will assert its right to settle a question of that kind for one of its Members. I think the rule was intended where wholly apart from a pair a Senator asks to be excused. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] on the first roll call this afternoon asked to be excused upon the ground that he had an interest in the matter. My own opinion is that it is not such an interest as would have disqualified him. I think the Senator from New Hampshire and my friend from Georgia are a little oversensitive about this matter. If I had been in the position of either, I would have voted for myself as the nominee of my party. I have done it, and I believe that every time a vote is taken a man ought to support his party's nominee.

But I waive that. I state it only as one of the questions which the Senate might decide, as to whether it was a good excuse, because that rests in the judgment of a Senator. But whether or not a Senator shall keep his pair rests with the conscience of the Senator, and I do not acknowledge the right of the Senate to decide that sort of a question for me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that under the rule this question must be decided after the conclusion of the roll call. Debate is now out of order.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I ask leave to say one word with reference to the observations of the Senator from Texas.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection, the Senator from New York will proceed.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I shall be quite content if the Senate determines to excuse the Senator from Idaho. I do not wish to permit the pairing of two Republican Senators——

Mr. BAILEY. Oh, but they are different kinds. [Laughter.]

Mr. ROOT. I do not wish the pairing of two Republican Senators, which has the effect of withdrawing two votes in opposition to the Democratic candidate to go sub silentio; and I make this objection in order that it shall be understood that the effect of this proceeding is to destroy two Republican votes and defeat the candidate of the Republican caucus, and if effective to elect a Democratic President pro tempore of the Senate.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair must reiterate that this debate is proceeding by unanimous consent. If there is no objection, the Chair will recognize the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, if the Senate shall determine to make the precedent which the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] seeks to raise here, it may take notice now that such a precedent will return many times to plague it hereafter.

I do not recognize, sir, the right of any Senator here, directly or indirectly, to make against me the criticism that I am voting against my party because that vote is against the action of Members of this Senate regarding the public business in a secret meeting held in some place outside this Chamber. I deny the right of any secret caucus held outside of the Senate Chamber behind closed doors, with no reporters present, to dispose of the public business or anything which may exercise an important or controlling influence upon the public business.

I regard the election of a President pro tempore of this great body as of great importance in the conduct of its business. It is of tremendous importance at times, Mr. President, in determining what measures shall pass this body. I do not propose to be read out of the Republican Party because I can not conscientiously support some man whom a number of my party associates have agreed upon in a secret meeting as their choice for President pro tempore of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is the duty of the Chair to call the attention of the Senate to the stringency of the rule. The Chair has relaxed it.

RULE XII.

1. When the yeas and nays are ordered, the names of Senators shall be called alphabetically; and each Senator shall, without debate, declare his assent or dissent to the question, unless excused by the Senate; and no Senator shall be permitted to vote after the decision shall have been announced by the Presiding Officer, but may for sufficient reasons, with unanimous consent, change or withdraw his vote. No motion to suspend this rule shall be in order, nor shall the Presiding Officer entertain any request to suspend it by unanimous consent.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, in view of the fact that everybody except the Senator immediately concerned has had a say, I think the Chair ought to read that rule after that Senator has finished.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair merely sought to do what he deemed it his duty to do—to call the attention of the Senate to the stringency of the rule.

Mr. BAILEY. The Chair is well within his right and his duty, but I think the rule ought to be read after the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], whose right to be excused from voting is challenged, has been heard.

Mr. BORAH and Mr. HEYBURN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The junior Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I only want to say a word. This is the first time since I have been in the Senate that I have ever consented to pair at all, because I am not very much in favor of the practice or the principle. However, there were circumstances connected with this matter which I thought justified me in making this pair, and I regard it as purely a matter of conscience between the Senator from California [Mr. WORKS] and myself. I think the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] drifted aside from the question when he suggested that it was the result of an understanding or an effort by this process to do indirectly what we would not do directly—that is, to elect a member of the Democratic Party as President pro tempore of the Senate.

I cast my vote in accordance with what I believe to be the best interests of the organization of which I am an humble member, and I am not seeking in any way by this process to relieve myself of direct action. I am perfectly content in all matters which relate merely to the organization of my party to abide by the majority vote in caucus. If I am inside of the caucus I feel that I am competent to determine what I ought to do without the advice, aid, or suggestion of anyone else. The caucus having acted upon this matter, I was perfectly content to cast my vote for the caucus nominee, and my action was not taken with the design of embarrassing the party nor giving an advantage to the opposition party, but to accommodate a Senator who had to be absent and who could not avoid being absent. For that reason I consented to vote, as I have, by pair. It was purely to accommodate an absent Senator. I do not do business here or elsewhere by indirection.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. CULLOM. Regular order!

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if there is no objection, I should like to say just a word so that there will be no misunderstanding in relation to the statement in regard to the secret meeting. I think it ought to be understood that a Republican caucus was regularly called and there was not a member of the Republican Party but received notice to attend that caucus. That could only be called a secret meeting in the same way that the caucus of the Democratic Party or of any other party holding a meeting for the determination of questions of this sort.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will resume the calling of the roll.

The Secretary resumed the calling of the roll.

Mr. DIXON (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS].

Mr. HEYBURN. I object to the excuse of the Senator on that ground.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question will be decided after the roll call shall have been concluded.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think, Mr. President, the rule provides that when an objection is made the question shall be decided at the time by a vote without debate. I refer to Rule XII.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana [Mr. DIXON] has declined to vote on the call of his name and has assigned his reason, which is a pair. The question before the Senate is, Shall the Senator for the reason assigned by him be excused from voting? Those in favor of the motion—— which shall be decided without debate; and these proceedings shall be had after the roll call and before the result is announced.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I call attention to paragraph 2 of Rule XII:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That was the impression of the Chair. The Chair thinks the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] is right. The Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] suggested that this question should be decided now, but the Chair thinks the Senator from Texas is correct, and that the question must be decided after the conclusion of the roll call. The Secretary will resume the calling of the roll.

The Secretary resumed the calling of the roll.

Mr. KENYON (when his name was called). I make the same announcement I have previously made as to my pair with the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. BOURNE].

Mr. McCUMBER (when his name was called). I restate my previous announcement as to my pair, and withhold my vote.

Mr. HEYBURN. I object in that case to the withholding of the vote of the Senator.

Mr. PERKINS (when his name was called). I again announce my general pair with the junior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN]. If he were present, he would vote for the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], and if I were at liberty to vote I should vote for the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER].

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. HEYBURN. Now, Mr. President, before the vote is announced, the question is——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair was about to put that question. Objection having been made to two Senators withholding their votes—the Senator from Montana [Mr. DIXON] and the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER]—under the rule of the Senate each of those Senators is entitled to assign his reasons for declining to vote, and, having assigned them, it becomes the duty of the Chair to put the question to the Senate, which shall be decided without debate.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I submit as a point of order, that the question of pairs is not within either the spirit or the letter of that rule, and that the rule does not apply to the case where a Senator announces his pair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of opinion that pairs are not recognized by the rules anywhere, and that they are only a reason for not voting.

Mr. BAILEY. But, Mr. President, while not recognized by the rules, they are recognized by the uniform practice of the Senate and become as much a part of the rules as if they were expressly written in them.

Now, Mr. President, I want to make just this suggestion: If it is within the power of the majority present in the Chamber to compel a Senator to vote notwithstanding his pair, then, if you succeed in electing a President pro tempore—which looks very doubtful now, as we are enjoying the novel and delightful sensation of seeing a Democratic candidate run ahead in the Senate—but if you should succeed in electing a President pro tempore, when we found you down at lunch the day after tomorrow, we could depose him and elect one of our own. We could pass the word about the Senate Chamber on the Democratic side for them all to remain here, and we could then release all of our Senators who announced their pairs and compel them to vote, and, having a majority, we could refuse to release the Senators on the other side.

The purpose of a pair is not wholly to serve the convenience of Senators. It is broader and more important than that. It was to preserve that relation between the parties which the people had established by their elections; it was to provide against a contingency where a larger number of the majority party happen to be sick or absent, whether engaged upon their personal affairs or public business—under such circumstances they still might seek and obtain pairs with the minority and thus preserve the right of the majority to control the proceedings of the Senate.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I interpose a question of order. I believe under the rule that no option is given with reference to debate, and the rule says that we must first vote upon this, and that other proceedings may follow the vote.

Mr. BAILEY. I understand that, and I think, Mr. President, on the question itself, as to the sufficiency of the reason, debate would be precluded; but I am not raising the question as to the sufficiency of the reason, I am raising the question that, under the practice of the Senate, the sufficiency of the reason is not a matter for the Senate's determination, and I submit that point. If it were that a Senator would say, "I am interested" or "I am not qualified," or should assign any other reason for not voting, which the Senate could determine for itself, then the rule would apply; but my contention is that the pair having been recognized immemorially in the Senate, until it has become a part of the Senate's procedure, is a matter for each Senator's own conscience and not for the Senate to determine.

Let me make this one suggestion, and then I will yield the floor: Suppose a Senator, despite his pair, should vote and announce to the Senate and to the world that he voted because he found that his single vote would be decisive of the question, will any Senator contend that we would have the power to reject that vote? No, sir. The rules of the Senate leave it to each Senator, and if it be left to the Senator in one instance, when he seeks to violate his faith to a fellow Senator, it must be left to him in the other instance to keep that faith. The very reason that our rules are silent with reference to pairs is that it was expected and intended to leave that question to Senators to decide for themselves.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I understood that I had the recognition of the Chair, and I desire——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] rose to a point of order.

Mr. HEYBURN. Well, I had risen to a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understood that the Senator's proposition was to proceed under the rule, and the Senator from Texas has raised a point of order.

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not desire to interfere with the Senator holding the floor——

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] has called my attention to an instance where it was expressly decided on June 20, 1860—and, of course, the rules no more recognized the pair then than they do now—that a Senator may refuse to answer to his name when called to vote when he is paired with another Senator. There is also another decision on that same question, and, as I understand, to the same effect.

I should dislike more than I can express to see the Senate of the United States assume the power to determine for one of its Members whether he would keep his promise to a brother and absent Senator. I would not heedlessly defy the Senate, but I say, without one moment's hesitation, that should the Senate order me to vote contrary to my pair I would refuse to obey its order, even if my refusal provoked my expulsion, for no majority can determine for an honorable man whether he will keep his word.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I do not know whether the Senate has finished the consideration of the point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas, as the Chair understands, has raised a point of order.

Mr. HEYBURN. I was on the floor, and had been recognized when he raised the point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Certainly. The Senator from Texas raised a point of order, which amounts to saying that an objection can not be made to a Senator withholding his vote when he is paired, and that the proceedings under paragraph 2 of Rule XII can not take place.

Mr. BAILEY. They are not applicable.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. And that they are not applicable. The Chair will rule on that point at the proper time, but is ready to hear discussion, of course.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Mr. President, I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry, which is whether at this time any Senator can give any additional reason for withholding his vote other than the statement of the pair before the question is passed upon. It seems to me that he can, and I wish to say a word upon that point.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the opinion of the Chair a Senator can state his reasons in any way he pleases.

Mr. MCCUMBER. The object of the pair is to balance the strength of the political parties upon anything that is made a political question; and even though it were in the power of the Senate to compel a Senator to vote upon the question, any Senator who has a pair with a Senator on the opposite side on a question of this kind would be compelled, in order to maintain the balance between the parties, to vote, not for his choice, but to vote for some one else; and if my pair, who would vote for the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], were not present, and could not vote for him, and I should be compelled to vote, I would not vote for the choice of my own caucus nominee. But in order to maintain that balance I should vote for some other Republican. So nothing would be gained by it; and I would give that as another reason for maintaining my pair.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that when the Senate adjourns today it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. BACON. We can not hear, Mr. President.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President——

Mr. CULBERSON. I rise to a question of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. So much has intervened that the Chair overlooked the fact that the result of the roll call had not been announced, and nothing is in order except the determination of the objection raised against two Senators who declined to vote. The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] has stated his reasons. The Senator from Montana [Mr. DIXON] has stated his. On the point of order raised by the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] the Chair is unable, although he agrees entirely with the Senator from Texas as to the usage and as to the character of a pair, to see that under the rule a pair has any existence except as a reason for not voting, and therefore the Chair puts the question: Shall the Senator from Montana, for the reasons assigned by him, be excused from voting? [Putting the question.] The ayes have it, and the Senator from Montana is excused from voting.

The Chair will put the same question as to the Senator from North Dakota, if it is desired. Shall the Senator from North Dakota be excused from voting for the reasons assigned? [Putting the question.] The ayes have it, and the Senator from North Dakota is excused.

The Secretary will announce——

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will announce the result.

Mr. HEYBURN. Well, Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The rule says "any further proceedings in reference thereto shall be after such announcement."

The roll call resulted as follows:

FOR MR. BACON—35.

Bailey	Hitchcock	O'Gorman	Smith, S. C.

Brown	Frye	Perkins
Clarke, Ark.	Kenyon	Stephenson

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy-four Senators have voted; necessary to a choice, 38. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] has 35; the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], 32; the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP], 4; the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], 1; the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], 1; and the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW], 1.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, under no circumstances would I assert or support any position that contemplated any Member of this House or any man violating a contract within the terms of the contract that he had made. This is not the first time during my service here that this question has been before the Senate. At one time there was a very deep feeling—how deep I can not say at this time—because of certain remarks that I made in the Senate. About that time a question was coming on for a vote. The usual procedure was taken. The Assistant Doorkeeper on this side applied to probably the Assistant Doorkeeper or whoever has charge of the pairs on the other side, and a pair was refused me because of having made that speech, and then I objected to the pairs, and the Senate sustained me.

Now, I have been giving some attention to this rule. Every man who makes a pair makes it subject to two conditions—first, he makes it subject to the conditions of maintaining a quorum in the body. The Chair may order a pair broken to make a quorum. Again, a Member makes it subject to the will of the Senate as to whether or not public business shall be suspended because of all of the Senators or enough of them being paired to defeat the transaction of public business. Now, those are conditions that are just as much a part of a pair as though they had been written upon the face of an instrument.

I raised this objection to-day because it is evident that there is a cabal here that intends to defeat the performance of a public duty by the Senate. It has been boasted here that there are but two parties in the Senate. Men have stood upon the floor here recently and frequently asserted that they belonged to this or that party, regardless of their vote. In all legislative bodies in this country, of whatever political faith, the caucus is the meeting of the members of one or the other of the parties for the purpose of determining the course of that party upon political questions, and when you talk of a question of honor, there is the pressure of honor upon every man who claims to belong to the party which has held the caucus on political questions. His denial of it lessens it not one whit. His staying out of the caucus is staying out of the party. Whenever you break down those rules you have broken down all that may possibly maintain a party organization.

I did not object to the pair of either the Senator from North Dakota or the Senator from Montana for any personal reasons. I divided the honors. One of them was paired with a Democrat and one of them with somebody else. [Laughter.]

I do not propose to shirk this question. It is a delicate one, and far from a pleasant question to raise. But if a man is going to belong to a party and stand with its organization, he must be governed by the rules of a majority of that party when they meet for the purpose—the express and avowed purpose—of determining what that policy shall be. A casual meeting, a poll of men, would not bind him, but if he is not bound by that caucus, he is not a member of the party that holds it. We may just as well be a little bit candid about this question. I raised it because, if we are going to transact public business, we must have the action of every Senator who is present; and it does not involve the question suggested by the Senator from Texas as to the honor, because the yielding of the pair is qualified, when the pair is agreed upon, by those two provisions, one of them frequently exercised, the other less frequently. Conditions such as exist here to-day do not in the providence of God often exist.

Mr. President, I say that much in support of my action in challenging these pairs. Having had a previous experience here as to the quality, character, and efficiency of a pair, I felt that this was a proper occasion to illustrate the fact that pairs are not always regarded as a matter of right or of sacred character.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President——

Mr. GALLINGER. The motion is not debatable.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Illinois that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next. [Putting the question.] The ayes appear to have it.

Mr. CULBERSON. I ask the Chair to call for the negative votes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thought he had done so.

Mr. CULBERSON. Not very distinctly, I think.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (again putting the question). The ayes appear to have it.

Mr. CULBERSON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina (when his name was called). Has the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. RICHARDSON] voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that he has not voted.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Then with great fear and trepidation I announce that I have a general pair with him, and withhold my vote. I hope it will not precipitate discussion.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. PERKINS (after having voted in the affirmative). I desire to withdraw my vote because of my pair with the junior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN].

The result was announced—yeas 35, nays 42, as follows:

YEAS—35.

Bradley	Cullom	Lippitt	Penrose
Brandegee	Curtis	Lodge	Root
Briggs	Dillingham	Lorimer	Smith, Mich.
Bristow	Dixon	McCumber	Smoot
Brown	du Pont	McLean	Sutherland
Burnham	Gallinger	Nelson	Townsend
Burton	Gamble	Nixon	Warren
Clark, Wyo.	Guggenheim	Oliver	Wetmore
Crane	Heyburn	Page

NAYS—42.

Bacon	Gore	Martine, N. J.	Simmons
Bailey	Gronna	Myers	Smith, Md.
Borah	Hitchcock	Newlands	Stone
Bryan	Johnson, Me.	O'Gorman	Swanson
Chamberlain	Johnston, Ala.	Owen	Taylor
Chilton	Jones	Paynter	Terrell

NOT VOTING—14.

Bankhead	Cummins	Perkins	Tillman
Bourne	Frye	Richardson	Works
Clarke, Ark.	Overman	Smith, S. C.
Crawford	Percy	Stephenson

So Mr. CULLOM's motion was rejected.

Mr. DIXON. I now renew my motion that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will proceed to take another ballot for President pro tempore.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BORAH (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the junior Senator from California [Mr. WORKS]. If he were present, I would vote for Senator GALLINGER and he would vote for Senator CLAPP.

Mr. DIXON (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS]. If he were present, I would vote for Senator GALLINGER.

Mr. KENYON (when his name was called). I announce the same pair as on the former ballot.

Mr. McCUMBER (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. PERCY] to the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. RICHARDSON] and vote for Mr. GALLINGER.

Mr. PERKINS (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the junior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN]. If he were present, he would vote for Senator BACON and I would vote for Senator GALLINGER.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. RICHARDSON] to the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. PERCY] and vote. I vote for Mr. BACON.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I wish to state that my colleague [Mr. BANKHEAD] on all these votes for President pro tempore stands paired with the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE].

The roll call resulted as follows:

FOR MR. BACON—35.

NOT VOTING—17.

Bankhead	Crawford	Overman	Tillman

Clarke, Ark.	Kenyon	Stephenson

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy-four Senators have voted; necessary to a choice, 38. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] has received 35 votes; the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] has received 32 votes; the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] has received 4 votes; the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], 1; the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], 1; and the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW], 1.

Mr. STONE. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President. Did I understand the Chair to rule that under the Constitution of the United States a President pro tempore could not be elected by a plurality vote?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is very clearly of opinion that under the Constitution of the United States, in the absence of any provision to the contrary, all officers of both Houses must be elected by a majority; and in the practice of the House, where there have been contests very frequently, a majority vote has been and is required.

Mr. STONE. I wish to ask another question, Mr. President. It is whether at this point, the hour of 4 o'clock having arrived, it is proper, notwithstanding the pending business, to lay the unfinished business before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is inclined to believe that the matter in which the Senate is engaged is a privileged matter and, being engaged in a roll call, it could not be interrupted even by the unfinished business.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, the Constitution of the United States, I beg leave to say in opposition to the announcement of the Chair a moment ago, contains no provision with reference to the vote by which a President pro tempore of the Senate may be elected. If the Chair would kindly cite me to a provision of the Constitution of the United States to that effect, I would be glad to see it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is aware that there is no provision in the Constitution of the United States in so many words requiring a majority vote for the election of a President pro tempore, neither is there a provision requiring it for a Speaker of the House. It makes the same provision for the officers of both Houses, and in the opinion of the Chair it is the contemplation of the Constitution that a majority should be required for the election of all officers.

Mr. CULBERSON. The Constitution of the United States expressly provides that each House of Congress, the Senate and the House of Representatives, may make rules for their government, but there is nothing in the Constitution nor in the rules of the Senate that provides by what vote the President pro tempore shall be elected.

Jefferson's Manual, which, while it is argumentative and persuasive, is not a part of the rules of the Senate, at page 134 of the manual, if the Chair desires to examine it, recites that in the absence of anything to the contrary the majority rule shall prevail. As there is nothing in the rules of the Senate proper or in the Constitution of the United States which declares by what vote officers of the Senate shall be elected, either a President pro tempore or any other officer of the Senate, I give it as my opinion for whatever it may be worth that it is within the province of the Senate at this time to determine by what vote a President pro tempore shall be elected.

I merely make that statement because I did not want the statement of the Chair to go unchallenged, at least to the extent of my dissent from it.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, supplementing what my colleague has said, I agree with the Chair that the same rule applies to the election of a President pro tempore of the Senate that applies to the election of a Speaker of the House; and unless I am mistaken it has been expressly decided that the House may choose a Speaker by a plurality vote. Without being positive, I venture to say that the youngest man ever elected Speaker of the House, Hon. Howell Cobb, of Georgia, was elected by a plurality vote.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, we have adopted Jefferson's Manual as a part of the rules of this body. It is provided at page 134 of the Senate Manual:

> The voice of the majority decides.

If any Senator will turn to that page——

Mr. BAILEY. Nobody questions that, in the absence of the rule——

Mr. HEYBURN. There is no absence.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senate could adopt a rule at this moment to choose the President pro tempore by a plurality vote.

Mr. HEYBURN. But that exception is not in the rule.

Mr. CULBERSON. I call the attention of the Senate to Jefferson's Manual, at page 134, from which the Senator from Idaho reads, but I do not believe the Senate has ever even adopted that or Jefferson's Manual as a part of the rules of the Senate.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator will admit that Jefferson's Manual provides specifically, without any exceptions or provisos, that the voice of the majority decides. There is no proviso in that section; there is no alternative.

Mr. BAILEY. It simply states a general rule, which may be modified at the pleasure of the Senate.

Mr. CULBERSON. Unless otherwise provided.

Mr. HEYBURN. It states a rule which we have adopted. We have adopted it, and unless some motion is made——

Mr. BAILEY. How, when, and where did we adopt the majority rule? I understand the Chair has held, and I think properly, that in the absence of any provision to the contrary it requires a majority vote to elect; but I have no doubt that it is within our power to supersede that requirement and provide that a President pro tempore may be chosen by a plurality.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, the affirmative is the other way. There is no alternative or conditional provision attached to this requirement, and it being a part of the rules of this body we can not amend our rules on the floor, because we have provided the manner in which the rules may be amended.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I make the point for the decision of the Chair that we have been proceeding here for two weeks, it may be more, with the business of the Senate without a President pro tempore, the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] having resigned from that office. His resignation was laid before the Senate, and it was peremptory. We have been transacting business.

My friend from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] says to me, aside, that we elect a President pro tempore, and the necessity for electing one arises only in the absence of the Vice President; but, Mr. President, we have gone on here, I know, in the transaction of the business of the Senate in the absence of the Vice President. Since the resignation of the Senator from Maine was laid before the Senate I have seen, and you have seen, other Senators occupying the chair and called to the chair by the Vice President, either personally or by a written request that he would take the chair.

Now, sir, is it to be said that the entire business of this session is to be locked up and that nothing can be done until a President pro tempore is chosen? The contest that has developed here to-day might run on indefinitely for weeks and months. I put it to the Chair whether it is not within the province of the Vice President, following the precedent already set and the practice of the Senate already observed, to call a Senator to the chair as he called the Senator from Massachusetts, who now occupies the chair, to that position, and that we can go on with the business of the Senate; hence, that it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which is the joint resolution amending the Constitution for the direct election of Senators by the people.

I do not believe that that important measure or any other important measure ought to be indefinitely delayed by a contest of this kind, which may be protracted for months and perhaps through the whole Congress. I ask the Chair to rule whether it is not the province and duty of the Chair to lay the unfinished business before the Senate?

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, does not the rule that we may take up nothing while a vote is pending apply until this question is laid aside by the Senate? Are we not now, in legislative contemplation, engaged in voting upon this question until we have either determined it or it has been lain aside? I think that interpretation is borne out by the rule, and that it is not in order to interrupt the voting upon this question. We may lay it aside, then we are at liberty to take up another matter, but I think until we do lay it aside that we must continue with it. I ask that the regular business be proceeded with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will say that what the Chair understood to be the point of order was raised on the question of a majority vote and also on the question of the unfinished business.

The Chair will restate his position on the unfinished business. The Chair is inclined to think that this business now before the Senate is privileged, but there can be no doubt that the Senate is engaged in voting. The Chair does not think that can be interrupted by the unfinished business or in any other way except by the Senate laying aside the business before it or by adjourning or going into executive session. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BORAH (when his name was called). I make the same announcement that I have heretofore made.

Mr. McCUMBER (when his name was called). I again announce my pair, and transfer the same to the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. RICHARDSON], and vote. I vote for the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER].

Mr. PERKINS (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN].

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. RICHARDSON], and the transfer of that pair to the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. PERCY], so I will vote. I vote for the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON].

The roll call having been concluded, it resulted as follows:

FOR MR. BACON—35.

Bailey	Hitchcock	O'Gorman	Smith, S. C.
Bryan	Johnson, Me.	Owen	Stone
Chamberlain	Johnston, Ala.	Paynter	Swanson

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy-four Senators have voted; 38 votes are necessary to a choice. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] has received 35 votes; the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], 32; the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP], 4; the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], 1; the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], 1; the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW], 1; and there has been no choice.

The Chair desires to call the attention of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] to another point in regard to the unfinished business. This point has been brought to the attention of the Chair by the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK]. The present Presiding Officer is occupying his position by the action of the Senate in suspending by unanimous consent clause 2 of Rule I. He therefore is occupying the place which the rules design for the occupancy at this time of the Secretary of the Senate. It is perfectly obvious that the Secretary of the Senate, if now presiding over the proceedings of the Senate, could not carry on other business, for the rule explicitly says he is to preside only "pending the election of a President pro tempore." Therefore, as the Chair is occupying the position of the Secretary of the Senate and is not President pro tempore or holding the place by virtue of the appointment of the Vice President, it seems to him perfectly clear that during his occupancy of the chair no business is in order except that of choosing a President pro tempore.

The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BORAH (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the Senator from California [Mr. WORKS].

Mr. McCUMBER (when his name was called). As previously stated, I am paired with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. PERCY]. I transfer that pair, as on the previous vote, to the Senator from Delaware [Mr. RICHARDSON] and vote. I vote for the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER].

Mr. PERKINS (when his name was called). I again announce my general pair with the junior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN].

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina (when his name was called). Under the arrangement stated by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER], the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. RICHARDSON], with whom I am paired, stands paired with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. PERCY], which leaves me at liberty to vote. I vote for the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON].

Mr. TAYLOR (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BRADLEY], who was compelled to leave the Senate on account of illness.

The roll call having been concluded, it resulted:

FOR MR. BACON—34.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy-two Senators have voted; 37 are necessary for a choice. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] has 34 votes; the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], 31; the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP], 4; the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW], 1; the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], 1; and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], 1. There is no choice. The Secretary will again call the roll.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I move that the Senate adjourn to meet on Monday next at 2 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin moves that the Senate adjourn until Monday next at 2 o'clock.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I rise to two points of order. First, presumably the Secretary of the Senate is in the Chair, and he can not pass upon or submit a motion. He is not a legislative officer; second, the two motions can not be consolidated. There must first be a motion that when we adjourn, it be to the time named, and that must be separate and distinct from the motion to adjourn. I think we must first lay aside the business in which the Senate is now engaged, the question of the election of a President pro tempore, before we can do any legislative business whatever.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is obliged to overrule both points of order. The Chair thinks it is perfectly clear that if the Secretary of the Senate were holding the place which the present Presiding Officer now holds, it would be within his power to put a motion to adjourn, otherwise it would never be possible to bring the proceedings to an end. He must be able to put some motion in order to end the proceedings, provided an election of President pro tempore has not been effected.

As to the second point, there is no sort of question—in fact, it is the second privileged motion—that the Senate can adjourn to a day certain.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, if I may be pardoned for being a little insistent, I think that the orderly proceeding would be, first, that a motion should be acted upon laying aside the special order, the proceedings under which are only conducted with some one else than a Member of this body in the chair. It is entirely convenient to proceed in that way, and we can not make the Senator from Massachusetts the Secretary of the Senate by unanimous consent or otherwise.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of opinion that he has been placed in his present position by the unanimous vote of the Senate. He is also clear that a motion to adjourn is always in order, and he therefore puts the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin, which is that the Senate adjourn until Monday next at 2 o'clock. The question is on that motion.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 43 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, May 15, 1911, at 2 o'clock p. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, May 12, 1911.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, continue, we beseech Thee, Thy spiritual gifts, and inspire us to seek Thee more diligently, that we may get nearer to Thee and empty ourselves of all selfish and ignoble desires; that we may bring our homes nearer the ideal; that the genius of our Government may more and more obtain; that by the force of our example we may lift the world to a higher standard of living, in Jesus Christ, our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Tuesday, May 9, 1911, was read and approved.

SEAL FISHERIES IN ALASKA.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Ways and Means, I desire to make a privileged report on House resolution 73.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 73.

Resolved, That the Secretary of Commerce and Labor be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish for the use and the information of the House of Representatives copies of all letters received, reports, and documents from his agents in charge of the seal islands of Alaska, together with copies of all instructions given to those officials aforesaid since January 1, 1904, up to date; also, copies of any and all letters addressed to him by citizens of the United States, or referred to him by the President or the Attorney General, which relate to the condition and management of the fur-seal herd, the conduct of the officers of the Government in charge of it, and the conduct of the work of the lessees on the seal islands aforesaid, since January 1, 1904, up to date.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the reading of the report.

The SPEAKER. There is an amendment also.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Yes; I ask for the reading of the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out, in lines 7, 8, 9, and 10, the words "also copies of any and all letters addressed to him by citizens of the United States or referred to him by the President or the Attorney General."

Mr. MADDEN. What is that in connection with, Mr. Speaker? I would like to ask the gentleman from New York what that is.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report.

Mr. MADDEN. Maybe the gentleman from New York might be able to answer the question I ask.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state the question he desires an answer to.

Mr. MADDEN. I desire to know what is referred to. He says, "copies of all letters by any citizens of the United States." What does it mean?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that it means striking out of the resolution that part of it which calls for the production of letters coming to the President or the Secretary of Commerce and Labor from private citizens, and leaves the resolution in its amended form refer only to the official communications between the head of the department and his agents on those islands.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report (H. Rept. 29).

The Clerk read as follows:

SEAL FISHERIES IN ALASKA.

Mr. HARRISON of New York, from the Committee on Ways and Means, submitted the following report (to accompany H. Res. 73):

The Committee on Ways and Means report back House resolution 73 as amended by striking out all after the word "date," in line 7, down to and including the words "Attorney General," on line 10, and recommend that the resolution as amended be passed.

The subject matter involved in this resolution has been before the House several times of late years and has been referred to in many hearings before the Ways and Means Committee, as well as before a committee of the Senate.

The fur seal fisheries are confined to the North Pacific Ocean and the Bering Sea. They have been reduced in numbers almost to the point of extinction. The herd of Russia to-day consists of not more than 20,000 seals. It is confined to the Kommandor Islands, off the Kamchatkan coast, in the Bering Sea. The Japanese herd is a small nucleus of less than 10,000 seals, which exists on Robbens Reef, Okotsk Sea. The Alaskan herd is confined to the Pribilof Islands, belonging to the United States, in the Bering Sea, and consists of less than 50,000 seals. All of these herds are practically commercially ruined. Japan has been so placed with her herd ever since 1898; Russia has been so placed with hers since 1906; and we are nearly in the same position.

The fur seal herd of Alaska is reported to be at this time on the verge of extinction, and there is reason to believe that nothing can save it from complete extinction unless an immediate and radical change in the existing rules and regulations is made which govern its slaughter by the hands of man in the sea and on the land.

The United States and Great Britain have recently entered into an agreement by which the butchery of the seals may be temporarily suspended, but this will be of little avail unless the pelagic sealing by the ships of other nations can be stopped. Existing treaties and laws do not permit us to interfere with the sealing ships of other nations outside of the 3-mile limit, and it is many miles out to the sea where the butchery of the female seals is done by foreign sealers. But the purpose of this resolution is to ascertain the facts as to the conduct of the killing of the seals on our own islands. Many charges of official neglect and malfeasance have been made in recent years, first, against the lessees of our Government, and this year against our Government itself, to the effect that our herd of seals was being unmercifully butchered, without regard for existing laws and regulations of the department. No official answers have been made to these charges. On April 30 of last year the killing of our fur seals was taken out of the hands of the lessees (the North American Commercial Co.) and the sole responsibility was placed upon the Secretary of Commerce and Labor by a law which passed the House on April 18, 1910, but that law made the killing of seals on the Pribilof Islands by the agents of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, subject to certain regulations of the department, and thus provided that none but male seals should be killed and that no seals should be killed under 2 years of age. In February of this year Dr. William T. Hornaday, of New York, representing the Camp Fire Club, and other gentlemen appeared before a Senate committee and charged that the fur seal herd had been unmercifully butchered last summer by the agents of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, without regard to sex and age.

At this hour it is imperative, before we go into a thorough review of the causes which have resulted in the dwindling of our magnificent public property on the seal islands of Alaska, to have in the possession of the House complete copies of the official records of our agents charged with the care and the conservation. A loss of 4,500,000 fur seals from our herd since 1882–83, so that to-day it numbers less than 50,000 animals, and is actually commercially ruined, makes it most desirable to have before the House the records of this great destruction of our natural resources.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask for immediate consideration of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. It is privileged.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. PAYNE. When this resolution was before the committee I interposed no objection to it, except to suggest that the resolution be put in the shape in which it is now amended; but it occurred to me later that this might be a very inopportune time to call for this correspondence.

Of course the Members of the House know that for a dozen or more years the Congress of the United States has endeavored to frame some measure by which we might stop pelagic sealing and the destruction of the seal herd. Just at this moment commissioners from Russia and Japan and Great Britain are here in Washington in consultation with representatives of the United States with a view to framing some sort of a treaty or agreement by which the seal herds may be preserved, and it might be unfortunate to publish the correspondence of the Government upon that subject while this commission is in session. It might not aid in accomplishing what every Member of the House and of Congress on both sides must desire, and that is the preservation of the herds.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. PAYNE. Certainly.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, this resolution is proposed to be amended by the committee striking out the request for letters addressed to the President or Attorney General by citizens of the United States. In view of the fact that there has been a charge, I think quite generally published, brought by private citizens, that there has been an illegal destruction of pups—pup seals—in that country, I would ask the gentleman what this resolution, without the amendments, will reveal, if anything?

Mr. PAYNE. It will reveal the correspondence between the officials of the United States on this subject, which covers the whole question and does bring out certain information which came to the Committee on Ways and Means through letters addressed to the department, which were so scandalous that the committee unanimously resolved not to have them printed.

Mr. MURDOCK. Does the gentleman mean by "scandalous" that they were untrue?

Mr. PAYNE. Yes; grossly untrue, and containing gross attacks upon Members of both Houses, which were disapproved by members of the committee on both sides. Public documents showed that they were untrue. Some of the gentlemen attacked have since died.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman, then, does not believe this resolution as amended will bring out any material facts to the House?

Mr. PAYNE. Oh, I certainly do. I think it will bring out all the material facts, and it will not bring out that immaterial, scandalous matter.

Now, I would suggest to my colleague whether it would not be well still further to amend this resolution by putting in the words, "If not incompatible with the public interest."

After these negotiations are over, which will not be long, I have no objection to passing this resolution as it is; but just at this time, when the matter is before the representatives of these great powers that have been offending in this matter, together with the representatives of the United States, my question is whether it would not be better to put in that clause, "If not incompatible with the public interest."

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Speaker, in substance the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], my colleague, and I are in agreement that all Members of the House on both sides are desirous of putting an end to the destruction of our fur-seal herd; but I can not follow the gentleman in his line of argument as to the possible effect of the adoption of this resolution upon the negotiations now pending in the Department of State. Every time it has been proposed to investigate the conduct of the destruction of our fur-seal herd the plea has been raised by somebody connected with the administration that we were just about to enter into treaty regulations which would be endangered by the publication of correspondence and statements concerning these matters. Every time that has been brought forward it has served to put an end for the time being to the proposition to investigate these matters. I, for one, think the time has come to put a stop to the use of that argument as an excuse. I think now is the best time to begin an investigation of the conduct by the Department of Commerce and Labor of matters relating to the fur-seal herd on the Pribilof Islands.

What is it that is going on in the Department of State to-day? It is not the same old thing that was going on for 10 years and that finally led to the adoption in February of this year of the so-called Hay-Elliott treaty, by which Canada agreed to cooperate with the United States in the regulation of the destruction of the seals on the Pribilof Islands and in the waters around those islands, by which agreement Canada is to receive a certain proportion of the seals when the killing is resumed 10 years hence. But that does not refer to Japan and Russia, the other two parties in interest, and the facts to be elicited by this resolution have no bearing upon the conduct of Japan and Russia in the premises. Japan and Russia are interested in destroying the seals outside of the 3-mile limit, whereas the purpose of this resolution is to ascertain the conduct of our Department of Commerce and Labor in the killing of the seals on the islands—two entirely distinct purposes. The one conflicts in no way with the other, and should not be used as an excuse to put a stop to this investigation again. For that reason I can not agree with my colleague in his line of reasoning.

Now, in view of the long report which was read to the House, I can see no further purpose in debating this subject, unless some gentleman on the other side of the House desires to have time yielded to him.

Mr. PAYNE. Just one moment. I was not aware that any investigation had ever been thwarted by the department. We have had this matter up before the Committee on Ways and Means every two years, ever since I have been a Member, for 24 years. We have had various investigations, and there have been a great many volumes printed upon the subject, giving us information especially upon the subject of pelagic sealing, which has been engaged in not only by Russia and Japan but by the Canadians, and the endeavor of the United States, of course, has been to stop the pelagic sealing. This law was passed only two years ago, according to my recollection.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Last year.

Mr. PAYNE. Last year. That authorized the Department of Commerce and Labor to regulate the killing of the fur seals on the islands. Before that it was done under contract, and under that contract the United States was powerless to regulate it. Now, if it is only desired to inquire into what the Department of Commerce and Labor has done, I have not the slightest objection, and I do not see how that can interfere in any way with this proposed treaty, but I do not want to bring out anything that is confidential, from which our opponents in these negotiations may get some aid and comfort, and perhaps thwart the treaty. That is my only object and my only desire.

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order. This is a very important question, and has been thrashed out here a dozen times, and yet nobody seems ever to understand it. It is of a good deal of importance.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. With pleasure.

Mr. MANN. As to the scope of the resolution, perhaps the opinion of the gentleman may have some weight, as it ought to have in the department, in determining what the resolution covers. I notice that the resolution says that the Secretary of Commerce and Labor shall furnish information, and so forth, in reference to documents, letters, and reports from his agents in charge of the seal islands of Alaska. I suppose that means the Government agents under the Department of Commerce and Labor.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois is aware that since the 30th of last April the killing of the fur seals has been conducted by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor through his agents; that the law we passed a little more than a year ago terminated the lease of the North American Commercial Co. and gave it into the hands of the department, so that the agents have been in charge of this killing.

Mr. MANN. I understand that the agents of the Government are the agents of the Secretary of the Department of Commerce and Labor.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Oh, that is a mere quibble. It means exactly the same thing.

Mr. MANN. Very well, if that is a mere quibble, what I wanted to get at is whether that is the same thing or not. A large share of the work in reference to the Pribilof Islands has been carried on in the past by the Revenue-Cutter Service under directions of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor through the Treasury Department, to which department the Revenue-Cutter Service is attached. Does it cover those?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Well, the gentleman from Illinois must see the distinction that I tried to point out a few moments ago. The work of the Revenue-Cutter Service relates to the seizure of vessels that are infringing upon the 3-mile limit, and it is an attempt to put an end to the pelagic sealing.

Mr. MANN. Oh, well, the gentleman is mistaken in a way about that. The directions of the Department of Commerce and Labor in reference to the seal islands of Alaska go away beyond the matter of the killing of the seals within the 3-mile limit.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. We would be glad to have all the information they will give us.

Mr. MANN. Well, that is all right. Now, let me ask the gentleman a further question. A few years ago the Department of Commerce and Labor sent a commission to Alaska, and, if my memory is correct, one of the commission was the fish commissioner, another was the solicitor of the Department of Commerce and Labor. A considerable amount of work was done, and I think it was published. Is it the intention to have that now republished?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. I think that would be advisable, as the basis of an investigation of this whole business.

Mr. MANN. What is the object of publishing a volume one year, and then, when it is still available, republishing it in another form another year?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. It is only a part of the record. It is incomplete, because no publication of facts has been made for the last two years.

Mr. MANN. Well, I question the desirability or the economy of publishing a thing two or three times.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, does the gentleman from New York think that this resolution will bring out any facts other than those we already have in public documents?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. I would say to the gentleman from Kansas, Mr. Speaker, that as I understand the purpose of his question it is the complement of the question he asked my colleague from New York [Mr. PAYNE], the former chairman of the committee, and I am in substantial agreement with the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] that letters written by private individuals to the President and to the Department of Commerce and Labor, while they may or may not contain much of value, are not necessarily included in the scope of this investigation. Those gentlemen are at liberty to present their charges to the Committee on Ways and Means, and I hope that they will do so and that when those charges are submitted due consideration will be given them by the committee and, if necessary, hearings of the committee will be held in order to entertain them and pass upon them.

Mr. MURDOCK. Then, if I understand the gentleman correctly, the information which will be elicited by this resolution will be incidental to a larger investigation.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Yes; if it transpires that there is something to investigate, which I for one believe there is.

Mr. MURDOCK. Does the gentleman really believe this resolution will elicit information other than that he already has access to in public documents?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Yes; I believe that for the last two years facts of great value will be produced. Mr.

Speaker, if no other gentleman desires to be heard, I move the adoption of the resolution as amended.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment recommended by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. HARRISON of New York, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bill and resolutions of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 1149. An act permitting the Minneapolis, St. Paul & Sault Ste. Marie Railway Co. to construct, maintain, and operate a railroad bridge across the St. Croix River between the States of Wisconsin and Minnesota.

S. J. Res. 11. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to deliver two condemned cannon to the Grand Army of the Republic.

Senate concurrent resolution 2.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 3,500 copies of Bulletin No. 30, in two parts, of the Bureau of American Ethnology, entitled "Handbook of American Indians," of which 1,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate, 2,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 500 copies for the use of the Bureau of American Ethnology.

SENATE BILL AND RESOLUTIONS REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate bill and resolutions of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

S. J. Res. 11. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to deliver two condemned cannon to the Grand Army of the Republic; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

S. 1149. An act permitting the Minneapolis, St. Paul & Sault Ste. Marie Railway Co. to construct, maintain, and operate a railroad bridge across the St. Croix River between the States of Wisconsin and Minnesota; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Senate concurrent resolution 2.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 3,500 copies of Bulletin No. 30, in two parts, of the Bureau of American Ethnology, entitled "Handbook of American Indians," of which 1,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate, 2,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 500 copies for the use of the Bureau of American Ethnology; to the Committee on Printing.

PRINTING AND BINDING, COMMITTEE ON EXPENDITURES IN THE STATE DEPARTMENT.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, I send to the Clerk's desk a privileged resolution, and I ask for its immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina presents a privileged resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 136.

Resolved, That the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department be authorized to have such printing and binding done as may be necessary for the transaction of its business during the Sixty-second Congress.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Report (H. Rept. 31) to accompany House resolution 136.

The Committee on Printing, having under consideration House resolution (H. Res. 136) authorizing the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department to have printing and binding done, report the same back to the House with the recommendation that the resolution be agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

PRINTING AND BINDING, COMMITTEE ON EXPENDITURES IN THE DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, I also offer the following privileged resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 138.

Resolved, That the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of the Interior be authorized to have such printing and binding done as may be necessary for the transaction of its business during the Sixty-second Congress.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Report (H. Rept. 30) to accompany House resolution 138.

The Committee on Printing having had under consideration House resolution (H. Res. 138) providing for the necessary printing and binding for the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department during the Sixty-second Congress, reports the same back to the House with the recommendation that the resolution be agreed to.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to agreeing to the resolution, but, after all, is it privileged? It seems to me it would require unanimous consent.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, the rule is that anything reported from the Committee on Printing in regard to printing is privileged. Any printing for Congress reported by the Committee on Printing is privileged, in my opinion.

Mr. CANNON. That would be printing for the use of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair wishes the gentleman from South Carolina to restate his proposition, as the Chair did not hear it.

Mr. FINLEY. I will state that any resolution reported in regard to printing for either House of Congress—and I take it that that would include the committees—is privileged, in my opinion. It has been so held heretofore.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman may be right. This authorizes a committee to have printing and binding done, and that is usually done by unanimous consent.

Mr. FINLEY. I think the gentleman from Illinois is in error.

Mr. CANNON. Well, having made the protest so that if it is not privileged it may not go into a precedent, I have no objection, and withdraw the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois withdraws the point of order. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

PRINTING AND BINDING, COMMITTEE ON EDUCATION.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, I also offer the following privileged resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 137.

Resolved, That the Committee on Education be authorized to have such printing and binding done as may be necessary for the transaction of its business during the Sixty-second Congress.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Report (H. Rept. 32) to accompany House resolution 137.

The Committee on Printing, have under consideration House resolution (H. Res. 137) authorizing the Committee on Education to have printing and binding done, reports the same back to the House with the recommendation that the resolution be agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

ARIZONA AND NEW MEXICO.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a report (H. Rept. 33) from the Committee on the Territories recommending the passage of a substitute for House joint resolution 14, and I also desire to submit along with it the views of the minority on the substitute resolution, and to give notice that I will move to take up this resolution on Tuesday next.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia offers a privileged resolution, which is ordered to be printed and referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. The Clerk will report the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

House joint resolution 14, approving the constitutions formed by the constitutional conventions of the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Virginia yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I do.

Mr. MANN. I desire to ask the gentleman whether he reports a new resolution or House joint resolution 14 with an amendment?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. House joint resolution 14 with an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the roll of committees.

During the call,

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, is this a continuance of the call of committees?

The SPEAKER. Yes; it is a continuance of it. The Clerk will proceed with the call.

During the call,

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. I understood the Speaker the other day to rule that he would take official notice of the fact that there was nothing on the calendar which could be taken up on call of the committees. If that be the case, I direct his attention now to the fact that there is nothing now on the calendar which can be taken up on call of committees to-day.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that he has not looked the matter up in the last day or two, but it was the Chair's understanding that there were a couple of small matters on the calendar.

Mr. MANN. There are matters on the Union Calendar, but it is not in order to call up anything on the Union Calendar on the call of committees.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is aware of that fact. If there is no business on the calendar the call will not proceed further.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Tuesday next.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama moves that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Tuesday next.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 123, noes 74.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 131, nays 83, answered "present" 12, not voting 159, as follows:

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask how am I recorded as voting?

The SPEAKER. In the negative.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I wish to withdraw my vote, Mr. Speaker. I find I am paired with the gentleman from Connecticut, Mr. TILSON, who is absent. I wish to vote "present."

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Speaker, I find I am paired with Mr. MOORE of Texas. I desire to change my vote. I voted "no."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the gentleman's name.

The Clerk called the name of Mr. HAYES, and he answered "present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

PRINTING AND BINDING, COMMITTEE ON EXPENDITURES IN THE DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BEALL].

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 160.

Resolved, That the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice be authorized to have such printing and binding done for the use of the committee as may be necessary during the Sixty-second Congress.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I understand this committee is working.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. The committee will have its first meeting to-morrow. There has been a vacancy on the committee, which was filled only yesterday, I believe. The committee will begin its work to-morrow, and it intends to prosecute that work.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

RECIPROCITY WITH SOUTH AMERICA.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege, and ask five minutes in which to state it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania rises to a question of personal privilege, and asks five minutes in which to address the House.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, in some remarks which I made on this floor on May 4 I referred to a conversation I had had with the then Secretary of State, Mr. ROOT, shortly following his visit to South America, wherein I made the observation that our party had been able to make some reciprocity treaties with these Republics, having in mind that we did have a treaty with Brazil once, which was afterwards abrogated, leaving us at her mercy in regard to the price of coffee which we imported from that country. It was my intention to emphasize in my remarks that I would be in favor of real reciprocity, namely, the exchange of free markets for noncompetitive products, because the exchange of markets for competitive products under the different conditions which may obtain in the two countries can not be real reciprocity. A paragraph of my impromptu remarks, containing certain figures which were used in a general collateral way, has been quoted by the Philadelphia Record in the narrow spirit of calling attention to the fact that my figures were not exactly accurate, but ignoring entirely the spirit of my contention. It does not matter what are the exact figures of our exports to and imports from Brazil. I could not wish to deceive my hearers in that respect, because the exact figures can be obtained from the Bureau of Statistics, but I do not propose to have my argument and the real pith of my contention belittled or ignored by even so conspicuous and ambitious an exponent of free trade as the Philadelphia Record; and to make my point clear I beg leave to briefly state again the contention which I had in mind.

When James G. Blaine became Secretary of State he at once advocated a closer commercial union with the country south of us, and this Pan American Union became a reality and a success. Mr. Blaine found that 87 per cent of the imports from Central and South America were free of duty, while nearly all of our exports were subject to heavy duties there, and that many of the articles which we imported to this country from those States were subject to heavy export duties. Because of this, he recommended a reciprocity amendment to the McKinley bill. The so-called reciprocity clause of that bill provided:

That with a view to secure reciprocal trade with countries producing the following articles, and for this purpose, on and after the 1st day of January, 1892, whenever and so often as the President shall be satisfied that the Government of any country producing and exporting sugar, molasses, coffee, tea, and hides, raw and uncured, or any of such articles, imposes duties or other exactions upon the agricultural or other products of the United States, which, in view of the free introduction of such sugar, molasses, coffee, tea, and hides into the United States, he may deem to be reciprocally unequal and unreasonable, he shall have the power, and it shall be his duty, to suspend, by proclamation to that effect, the provisions of this act relating to the free introduction of such sugar, molasses, coffee, tea, and hides, the production of such country, for such time as he shall deem just, and in such case and during such suspension duties shall be levied, collected, and paid upon sugar, molasses, coffee, tea, and hides, the product of or exported from such designated country, as follows, namely: On coffee, 3 cents per pound.

As soon as the McKinley law went into effect negotiations were entered into with various Governments for the purpose of effecting treaties in accordance with the above provisions.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, I ask for two additional minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks for two minutes more. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. By unanimous consent the gentleman will proceed for two minutes.

Mr. FOCHT. On April 1, 1891, the treaty which had been concluded with Brazil January 31 went into effect, while various other treaties were concluded with Spain, Santo Domingo, the German Empire, the Republic of Salvador, the British West Indies, the Republic of Nicaragua, the Republic of Guatamala, the Republic of Costa Rica, the Republic of Honduras, with Austria-Hungary, and with France and her colonies. South America at once placed many of our commodities on the free list and reduced the duties on others 25 to 50 per cent. France and Germany were compelled to withdraw discrimination against our pork, and the treaties made with the 10 countries in the Western Hemisphere secured favorable concessions on over 2,000 different articles. These advantages were entirely destroyed by the repeal of the reciprocity clause in the Gorman-Wilson law, immediately following which repeal duties were again imposed upon goods imported from the United States to those countries with which such treaties had been made.

As the reference in my remarks alluded to was to our treaty with Brazil and our importation of coffee, I will at present only allude to that commodity, and I repeat again what I said on that day, and which the record denies, that Brazil has imposed an export duty, or what is practically an export duty or surtax, on her coffee. This has been explained in so able a manner and at such length in a recent speech by Mr. NORRIS that I will go no further than to use his statement that not only has Brazil, through the export tax or, as it is called, valorization scheme, restricted the amount of coffee exported, but is able to so control the price that whereas in December, 1908, the price at New York of Rio standard No. 7 coffee was 6½ cents per pound, it is now quoted at over 13 cents, or an increase in price of more than 100 per cent. Here, then, is a case where we might be able, if we had any basis upon which to make a trade, to conclude a real reciprocity treaty that would be of benefit to the American consumer. Brazil produces coffee; we do not produce coffee. We do produce, for instance, agricultural implements; Brazil does not. Let us be in a position, I say, to make Brazil give us certain concessions in return for the concession which we make in laying no duty upon her coffee. That would be an instance of genuine reciprocity, and that is the kind of reciprocity that Mr. Blaine believed in and the kind of reciprocity William McKinley believed in when he said:

By sensible trade arrangements which will not interrupt our home production we shall extend the outlets for our increasing surplus.

A system which provides a mutual exchange of commodities is manifestly essential to the continued healthful growth of our export trade. We must not repose in fancied security that we can forever sell everything and buy little or nothing. If such a thing were possible, it would not be best for us or for those with whom we deal. We should take from our customers such of their products as we can use without harm to our industries and labor.

This, I contend, Mr. Chairman, is not free trade, but protection in its highest form, and because it is protection to our labor and industries, and because it would lower the price of any noncompetitive foreign production to our consumers, it is not wanted by the free-trade editors who would base their arguments upon a typographical or other immaterial error and ignore the spirit of the real contention. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I will also print as part of my remarks the following letter:

THE CONGRESS OF THE KNIGHTS OF LABOR,
Albany, N. Y., May 10, 1911.

Hon. BENJAMIN K. FOCHT,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I have your esteemed favor of the 9th instant, inclosing copy of your speech delivered in the House of Representatives on April 20, for which I thank you.

I have read the speech carefully, and am so impressed with the able manner in which you have presented the facts therein contained that I would like to place the document in the hands of each of our subordinate assemblies, as I know they will appreciate it as much as I have. Therefore if you could spare us 100 copies it will enable us to have it read in each of our assemblies.

With all good wishes, I am, very truly, yours,

J. R. MANSION,
Secretary and Treasurer.

BICENTENNIAL OF THE CITY OF MOBILE, ALA.

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
May 12, 1911.

House concurrent resolution 8.

Extending congratulations to the people of Alabama and to the city of Mobile on the two hundredth anniversary of the founding and settlement of the city and port of Mobile.

Be it resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the resolution passed by the Legislature of Alabama in regard to the bicentennial celebration at Mobile on May 26, 1911, be received.

The said resolution reads as follows:

"Senate joint resolution 52.

"No. 241.

"Whereas this year, 1911, is the two hundredth anniversary of the foundation and settlement of the city of Mobile, first capital of La Province de la Louisane, in 1711, and

"Whereas the city of Mobile and her people are making preparation for celebrating the event: Therefore be it

"Resolved by the senate of Alabama (the house of representatives concurring), That the Legislature of Alabama does hereby request the Senators and Representatives in Congress from the State of Alabama to bring the said anniversary celebration to the attention of Congress and the several departments of the United States Government and the representatives at Washington of foreign powers.

"Approved, April 6, 1911."

Be it further resolved, That the Congress of the United States acknowledges with pleasure the receipt of said resolution and appreciates the courtesy of the notice extended of that important event in the Nation's history.

Resolved further, That we commend the action of the city of Mobile in making preparations for this celebration. We regard that territory as one of the most valuable acquisitions of the Government and congratulate Alabama and the people of Mobile upon her growth as a city, and extend our best wishes for a successful celebration and a large attendance of patriotic American citizens.

Resolved further, That a copy of these resolutions be forwarded to the mayor of the city of Mobile in evidence of our appreciation of the work that will be done on May 26, 1911, in commemoration of the founding and settlement of our beautiful and progressive city on the Gulf.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I should like to ask whether the resolution adopted by the Legislature of Alabama has been formally laid before the House.

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. I have it in my hand.

Mr. MANN. Has there been any official communication from the Legislature of Alabama to the House of Representatives?

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. The official communication was embodied in the resolution which has been read, and I also hold a certified copy of it in my hand.

Mr. MANN. I suggest to the gentleman that before the House takes action upon the invitation it should be presented to the House.

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. I take great pleasure in accepting the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois and in laying the invitation and the original resolution before the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is undoubtedly correct in his suggestion. The Clerk will read the invitation.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas this year, 1911, is the two hundredth anniversary of the foundation and settlement of the city of Mobile, first capital of La Province de la Louisane, in 1711; and

Whereas the city of Mobile and her people are making preparation for celebrating the event: Therefore be it

"Resolved by the senate of Alabama (the house of representatives concurring), That the Legislature of Alabama does hereby request the Senators and Representatives in Congress from the State of Alabama to bring the said anniversary celebration to the attention of Congress and the several departments of the United States Government and the representatives at Washington of foreign powers.

Approved, April 6, 1911.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. CANNON rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois desire to address the House?

Mr. CANNON. I do want about five minutes, but not strictly upon this resolution. I have no objection to the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

PRINTING FOR COMMITTEE ON EXPENDITURES IN THE DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE AND LABOR.

Mr. ROTHERMEL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following resolution (H. Res. 161).

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 161.

Resolved, That the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Commerce and Labor be authorized to have such printing and binding done for the use of the committee as may be necessary during the Sixty-second Congress.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I notice that a number of these resolutions have been introduced and referred to the Committee on Printing, which has promptly reported them back to the House. That is the proper method. However, I shall not object to this if the gentleman states that that committee proposes to proceed with hearings, or has already commenced hearings.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman, and thinks he ought to state to the House, that after to-day these resolutions will have to take the regular course and go to the committee where they belong, and we will live up to that unanimous-consent resolution.

Mr. ROTHERMEL. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that our committee have already commenced work.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. UNDERWOOD rose.

Mr. CANNON. Was the gentleman from Alabama thinking of making a motion to adjourn?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I was.

Mr. CANNON. I should like about five minutes in which to address the House, if the gentleman will withhold his motion.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I should like to ask the gentleman from Illinois upon what subject he proposes to address the House?

Mr. CANNON. Touching the business of the House.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think that is a very general proposition. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] if it is a personal matter I will have no objection to it, but if it is a matter that will bring on a general debate I do not care to go into it at this time.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I do not know that it would, and I apprehend that it would not, but it touches the business of the House. It is not a matter personal to myself, except as I am a Member of the House.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that I would prefer to have a matter of the discussion of the business of the House go over till a later day. I do not desire to be discourteous to the gentleman from Illinois, but I prefer not to have it come up at this time.

Mr. CANNON. Yet it is but 20 minutes after 1 o'clock; quite early. I could have gotten the time on one of these resolutions, but I apprehended——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that I do not intend any discourtesy, and for a matter that was personal I would yield, but for a matter that involves the business of the House I can not do so at this time. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, a little later I shall find a way under the rules of the House to submit an observation.

The SPEAKER. Pending the motion to adjourn, the Chair will submit the following personal requests.

The Clerk read as follows:

LEAVES OF ABSENCE.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois requests leave of absence for 10 days, on account of important business.

Mr. KONOP requests leave of absence until June 12, 1911, on account of illness in his family.

Mr. GRAY requests leave of absence for two weeks, on account of sickness.

Mr. PALMER requests leave of absence for two weeks, on account of illness.

Mr. HENSLEY requests leave of absence for two weeks, on account of sickness in family.

Mr. KOPP requests leave of absence until June 1, on account of important business.

Mr. THISTLEWOOD requests leave of absence for two weeks, on account of business.

Mr. DAVENPORT requests leave of absence for two weeks, on account of important business.

Mr. CLARK of Florida requests leave of absence indefinitely, on account of sickness.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. GREGG of Pennsylvania asked unanimous consent to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers with the bill H. R. 5286, Sixty-first Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon; also the papers with the bill H. R. 27232, Sixty-first Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the requests be agreed to.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, I think the gentleman had better let me have five minutes. There are a good many requests there that would be subject to division.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I renew my motion that the House do now adjourn. I suppose that is in order pending these requests.

The SPEAKER. The motion to adjourn is undoubtedly in order.

Mr. CANNON. One moment, Mr. Speaker. I do not care to embarrass Members who make requests that ordinarily are granted by unanimous consent by making a motion, and I do not think that the motion to adjourn should embarrass them, in the event that it does. This will be apt two weeks from now, when the gentleman from Alabama attempts again to destroy the Monday for the discharge of the committees.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the several requests will be granted.

There was no objection.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States announced that the President had approved and signed the following joint resolutions:

On May 8, 1911:

H. J. Res. 2. Making appropriations for the payment of certain expenses incident to the first session of the Sixty-second Congress.

H. J. Res. 3. Making immediately available the appropriations for mileage of Senators and Members of the House of Representatives.

On May 11, 1911:

H. J. Res. 38. To grant authority to the American Red Cross to erect temporary structures in Potomac Park, Washington, D. C.

ADJOURNMENT.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. KENDALL and by Mr. MANN) there were—ayes 99, noes 49.

So the motion was agreed to.

Accordingly (at 1 o'clock and 28 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Tuesday, May 16, 1911, at 12 o'clock m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting to the House of Representatives information in response to House resolution 134 in regard to contracts let for Navy shoes (H. Doc. No. 49); to the Committee on Expenditures in the Navy Department and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting correspondence in regard to rent of quarters for Government officials in Cleveland, Ohio (H. Doc. No. 50); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

3. A letter from the Civil Service Commissioners, transmitting a list of useless papers on file in the commission and recommending that they be destroyed (H. Doc. No. 51); to the Committee on Disposition of Useless Executive Papers and ordered to be printed.

4. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a letter from the Secretary of State recommending change of wording in appropriation for contingent expenses of foreign missions for the current and ensuing fiscal years (H. Doc. No. 52); to the Committee on Foreign Affairs and ordered to be printed.

5. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a letter from the Secretary of the Interior in regard to paying for articles lost to exhibitors at the Alaska-Yukon-Pacific Exposition, Seattle, Wash. (H. Doc. No. 53); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

6. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting with a favorable recommendation a draft of a bill reenacting section 3287, Revised Statutes, relating to distilled spirits (H. Doc. No. 54); to the Committee on Ways and Means and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia, from the Committee on the Territories, to which was referred the joint resolution of the House (H. J. Res. 14), approving the constitution formed by the constitutional conventions of the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 33), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, the Committee on Pensions was discharged from the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1845) granting a pension to Vina Lindenbower, and the same was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. KNOWLAND: A bill (H. R. 9317) to provide a tactical organization for the mobile forces of the United States and to increase the efficiency of the Army; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. OLDFIELD: A bill (H. R. 9318) to confer jurisdiction to hear and determine appeals in cases arising under the laws relating to patents for inventions to the court of appeals of the District of Columbia; to the Committee on Patents.

By Mr. MARTIN of Colorado: A bill (H. R. 9319) to admit to the mails as second-class matter periodical publications issued by and under the auspices of benevolent and fraternal societies and trades unions; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

By Mr. ANDREWS: A bill (H. R. 9320) appropriating $5,000 for the construction of a test well in precinct 12, in the county of Quay, in the Territory of New Mexico; to the Committee on Appropriations.

By Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota: A bill (H. R. 9321) to facilitate prompt action on final proof on homestead entries; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. GRAHAM (by request): A bill (H. R. 9322) to establish in the District of Columbia a laboratory for the study of the criminal, pauper, and defective classes; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. THAYER: A bill (H. R. 9323) relative to the transportation of milk; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. MILLER: A bill (H. R. 9324) to regulate the issue of securities by transportation, telegraph, and telephone companies engaged in interstate commerce, for the purpose of better protecting the people against unreasonable rates and charges; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. HOLLAND: A bill (H. R. 9325) to provide for acquirement by condemnation of lands at Cape Henry, Va., for the purpose of fortification and coast defense; to the Committee on Appropriations.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9326) to provide for the naturalization of aliens who have served or shall serve for one enlistment of four years in the United States Navy or Marine Corps or for four years in the Naval Auxiliary Service; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

By Mr. MANN: A bill (H. R. 9327) providing for compensation to employees of the Government suffering personal injuries while working on the Panama Canal or Panama Railroad; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky (by request of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia): A bill (H. R. 9328) to amend "An act to regulate the height of buildings in the District of Columbia," approved June 1, 1910; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Also (by request of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia), a bill (H. R. 9329) to provide for the extension of Calvert Street, Cleveland Avenue, Rock Creek Drive, Twenty-eighth Street, Twenty-ninth Street, and Thirtieth Street NW., and for other purposes; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. MANN: A bill (H. R. 9330) to promote the safety of employees and travelers upon railroads by requiring the use of the block system by common carriers engaged in interstate commerce, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

SENATE.

MONDAY, May 15, 1911.

The Senate met at 2 o'clock p. m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Ulysses G. B. Pierce, D. D.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of Thursday last, when, on request of Mr. CULBERSON, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

DISPOSITION OF USELESS PAPERS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Civil Service Commission, transmitting a schedule of useless papers on the files of the commission which are not needed in the transaction of public business and have no permanent value or historical interest.

The communication and accompanying papers will be referred to the Joint Select Committee on Disposition of Useless Papers in the Executive Departments. The Chair appoints as the committee on the part of the Senate the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] and the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BURNHAM]. The Secretary will notify the House of Representatives of the appointment of the committee on the part of the Senate.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 8) relative to the receipt of a resolution passed by the Legislature of Alabama in regard to the bicentennial celebration at Mobile on May 26, 1911, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented a petition from the secretary of the United Anglers' League, of Brooklyn, N. Y., and also a petition of the United Anglers' League, of Greater New York, praying for the establishment of a cod hatchery adjacent to New York City, which were referred to the Committee on Fisheries.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Chamber of Commerce of Baltimore, Md., favoring the ratification of the proposed treaty of arbitration between the United States and Great Britain, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of the congregation of the Mountain Grove Church, of Brookgap, Va., and a petition of the Mothers' Club of the Young Woman's Christian Association of Scranton, Pa., praying for the enactment of legislation for the suppression of the opium evil, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a memorial of members of the Belleville District of the St. Louis German Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, remonstrating against the recent action of the Senate in permitting WILLIAM LORIMER to take his seat in the Senate, which was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

He also presented a memorial of sundry Indians of the White Earth Indian Reservation, Minn., remonstrating against the enactment of certain legislation recommended by a delegation of Indians from that reservation who are now in the city of Washington, which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also presented a petition of the New York Mercantile Exchange, praying that an investigation be made by the Department of Agriculture relative to the condition of frozen and dried eggs, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. CULLOM presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Henderson County, Ill., remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed reciprocal trade agreement between the United States and Canada, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. GALLINGER presented a petition of Cheshire County Pomona Grange, No. 6, Patrons of Husbandry, of Keene, N. H., praying for the passage of the so-called parcels-post bill, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented a petition of the Fortnightly Club of Keene, N. H., praying for the repeal of the present oleomargarine law, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented a petition of the Second Congregational Society (Unitarian) of Concord, N. H., and a petition of the Congregational Unitarian Society of Andover, N. H., praying for the ratification of the proposed treaty of arbitration between the United States and Great Britain, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of the Frank Jones Brewing Co., of Portsmouth, N. H., praying for the ratification of the proposed reciprocal trade agreement between the United States and Canada, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented memorials of sundry citizens of Ashland, Colebrook, East Swanzey, and Keene, all in the State of New Hampshire, remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed reciprocal trade agreement between the United States and Canada, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. LODGE. I present a resolution adopted by the Commercial Club of Brockton, Mass., remonstrating against a reduction of the duty on boots and shoes. I ask that the memorial be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Finance.

There being no objection, the memorial was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the boot and shoe manufacturing industry is one of the most important in the Nation, with a yearly output valued at more than $400,000,000; and

Whereas the workers in this industry earn more than $100,000,000 annually, and the dependents upon these wages number more than 1,000,000 people; and

Whereas a bill known as House bill 4413, now before our National Congress, contains a provision for admitting into this country almost all kinds of leather and shoes absolutely free of duty; and

Whereas the passage of the said provision would put our shoe industry and our shoe workers in competition with the product and the workmen of foreign countries; and

Whereas the wages paid to the workmen in foreign countries average less than 45 per cent of the wages paid here in Brockton; and

Whereas the distance of these manufacturing countries is no protection, in that goods may be shipped from England to Massachusetts, for instance, as quickly and as cheaply as they could be sent from Massachusetts to the Middle West; and

Whereas the passage of the said provision must mean either reduced wages here to meet the competition, or failing to meet it, a greatly reduced volume of business; and

Whereas we can not believe that the members of either political party want to imperil a great industry; and

Whereas we believe this enactment would mean a tremendous loss to our own Brockton people and to people elsewhere who are directly and indirectly dependent upon this industry: Be it

Resolved, That this business, the manufacturers, and the workmen who are engaged in it, and those who are dependent upon both, should be protected; that the present duty of 10 per cent is as small as can safely be made and still protect the exceedingly high-wage scale paid and the industry itself; that we, the members of the Commercial Club of the city of Brockton, for ourselves and our city, do respectively protest against the passage of that part of House bill 4413 which would abolish duty or reduce it below the present rate of 10 per cent; and that copies of this resolution be spread upon the records, sent to the President of the United States, to the two Senators from Massachusetts, and to the Congressmen from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE presented a petition of the Boot and Shoe Cutters' Assembly, Knights of Labor, of Salem, Mass., praying that an investigation be made into the alleged abduction from Indianapolis, Ind., of John J. McNamara, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. McCUMBER. I present a petition signed by about 25,000 farmers from my State, protesting against the Canadian reciprocity agreement. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BRISTOW presented a memorial of the Kansas State Live Stock Association, remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed reciprocal trade agreement between the United States and Canada, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a memorial of the Pfister & Vogel Leather Co., of New York City, N. Y., remonstrating against placing leather on the free list, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of General Dwight H. Bruce Branch, No. 134, National Association of Letter Carriers, of Syracuse, N. Y., praying that an investigation be made into the removal of certain letter carriers from the service at Seattle, Wash., which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented a petition of C. Tennant, Sons & Co., of New York City, N. Y., praying for a reduction of the duty on alloys and metals used in the manufacture of steel, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of the congregation of the African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church, of New York City, N. Y., praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution providing for the election of Senators by the direct vote of the people, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the Aird-Don Co., of Troy, N. Y., praying for the imposition of 1-cent postage on all packages weighing 1 ounce or less, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented a memorial of the National League of Commission Merchants of the United States, remonstrating against the passage of the so-called cold-storage bill, which was referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

He also presented a petition of the National Association of Master Bakers, of Philadelphia, Pa., praying that an investigation be made by the United States Department of Agriculture into the condition of frozen and dried eggs, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of New York City, N. Y., praying that the paper known as the Woman's National Weekly be admitted to the United States mails, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented a petition of Local Grange No. 912, Patrons of Husbandry, of Washingtonville, N. Y., praying for the passage of the so-called farmers' free-list bill, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented memorials of sundry citizens of Oswego, Oneonta, and Dunkirk, all in the State of New York, remonstrating against the adoption by the Government of the Taylor efficiency time system of shop management in navy yards and arsenals, which were referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also presented memorials of sundry citizens of New York City, Morrisonville, Olean, Jasper, Plattsburg, Schuyler Falls, Cadyville, Brooklyn, Water Mill, West Valley, Pittsford, Jamestown, and Macedon, all in the State of New York, remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed reciprocal trade agreement between the United States and Canada, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of New York City, Mechanicsville, Stillwater, and Half Moon, all in the State of New York, praying for the retention of the duty on wood pulp and paper, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. PERKINS presented a petition of Gaylord Post, No. 125, Department of California and Nevada, Grand Army of the Republic, of Upper Lake, Cal., praying for the passage of the so-called old-age pension bill, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. TOWNSEND presented memorials of sundry citizens of Muskegon, Mich., remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed reciprocal trade agreement between the United States and Canada, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. ROOT presented memorials of 65 citizens of New York, remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed reciprocal trade agreement between the United States and Canada, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. JONES presented a resolution adopted by the Chamber of Commerce of Seattle, Wash., favoring the enactment of legislation granting to the people of Alaska the right of local self-government, which was referred to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. SHIVELY presented a statement by Dr. Vesta M. Swarts, of Auburn, Ind., relative to the Army nurse pension law, together with reasons for increasing the rate of the present law, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of J. M. Studebaker, of South Bend, Ind., praying that an appropriation be made for the construction of the Lincoln Memorial Highway from the city of Washington to Gettysburg, which was referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. CURTIS presented a memorial of the Kansas State Live Stock Association, remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed reciprocal trade agreement between the United States and Canada, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of the congregation of Unity Church, of Topeka, Kans., praying for the ratification of the proposed treaty of arbitration between the United States and Great Britain, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. PAGE presented memorials of the congregations of the Seventh Day Adventists' Church of Randolph, the Seventh Day Adventists' Church of Enosburg, and of the Johnson and Morrisville Church of Seventh Day Adventists of North Hyde Park, all in the State of Vermont, remonstrating against the observance of Sunday as a day of rest in the District of Columbia, which were referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. BRANDEGEE presented a petition of the executive council of the Federation of Churches of Hartford, Conn., and petitions of sundry citizens of Bridgeport, Conn., praying for the ratification of the proposed treaty of arbitration between the United States and Great Britain, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Bridgeport, Conn., praying for the establishment of a national department of public health, which was referred to the Committee on Public Health and National Quarantine.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE.

Mr. DU PONT, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 2276) to correct the military record of W. W. Peyton, asked to be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, which was agreed to.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS INTRODUCED.

Bills and joint resolutions were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. KERN:

A bill (S. 2293) granting an increase of pension to James M. Kinnaman (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 2294) granting an increase of pension to Thomas H. Kennedy (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 2295) granting a pension to W. H. Padgett (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 2296) granting an increase of pension to George W. Allen (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 2297) granting an increase of pension to Emmett Langston (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. JOHNSON of Maine:

A bill (S. 2298) for the relief of Malcolm Johnson (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 2299) for the relief of Michael Burns; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. 2300) granting a pension to Mary J. Hill; and

A bill (S. 2301) granting an increase of pension to Mandred O. Savage (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. JONES:

A bill (S. 2302) for the relief of volunteer officers and soldiers who served in the Philippine Islands beyond the period of their enlistment; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. 2303) authorizing the adjudication and payment of the claim of Mary A. Heisinger; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. DIXON:

A bill (S. 2304) for the relief of Sarah E. Baxter, executrix of the last will and testament of Warren S. Baxter (with accompanying paper); to the Committee on Public Lands.

By Mr. BRISTOW:

(By request) a bill (S. 2305) providing for the adjustment and payment of accounts of laborers and mechanics arising under the eight-hour law; to the Committee on Education and Labor.

A bill (S. 2306) granting an increase of pension to Luther Barker; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. LIPPITT:

A bill (S. 2307) granting an increase of pension to Ann J. Rouse; and

A bill (S. 2308) granting an increase of pension to Luke Gray; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. WORKS:

A bill (S. 2309) to limit the number of saloons in the District of Columbia and to confine them to business streets, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. McCUMBER. I introduce a bill relating to the shipment of intoxicating liquors into prohibition districts. Ordinarily a bill of this kind, I assume, would go to the Committee on Interstate Commerce. Inasmuch as a bill somewhat similar was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, I, for the purpose of ascertaining its constitutional legality, prefer that this bill should go to the same committee.

By Mr. McCUMBER:

A bill (S. 2310) to divest intoxicating liquors of their interstate commerce character in certain cases (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on the Judiciary.

A bill (S. 2311) for the relief of Bellevadorah Steele; to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (S. 2312) to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1912, and for other purposes," and to establish a Board of Pension Appeals, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Appropriations.

A bill (S. 2313) for the relief of John L. Vennard, United States Navy, retired (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

A bill (S. 2314) granting an increase of pension to John Feeney; and

A bill (S. 2315) granting an increase of pension to Charles H. Senseney (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. PERKINS:

A bill (S. 2316) fixing the rank and precedence of naval attachés; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

A bill (S. 2317) for the relief of F. A. Hyde & Co.; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. NELSON:

A bill (S. 2318) granting an increase of pension to Walter E. Truax; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SHIVELY:

A bill (S. 2319) granting a pension to Albert De Witt Clinton Walker; and

A bill (S. 2320) granting a increase of pension to William Walker (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. WATSON:

A bill (S. 2321) to amend and reenact section 1 of the act of February 20, 1907, entitled "An act to regulate the immigration of aliens into the United States"; to the Committee on Immigration.

By Mr. CHILTON:

A bill (S. 2322) for the relief of the estate of Philip Null, deceased;

A bill (S. 2323) for the relief of J. B. Johnson; and

A bill (S. 2324) for the relief of the heirs of J. G. Hayman, deceased; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. SMITH of Michigan:

A bill (S. 2325) for the relief of Heinrich Stahlin;

A bill (S. 2326) for the relief of Willard W. Hubbell; and

A bill (S. 2327) for the relief of Robert B. Jennings (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. 2328) granting an increase of pension to Abial S. Loomis (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. BRANDEGEE:

A bill (S. 2329) granting an increase of pension to Ransford P. Williams;

A bill (S. 2330) granting an increase of pension to Nettie L. Jones; and

A bill (S. 2331) granting an increase of pension to Ann M. Forsythe; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. LODGE:

A bill (S. 2332) for the relief of John H. Calef, colonel, United States Army, retired (with an accompanying paper); to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. BRADLEY:

A bill (S. 2333) granting an increase of pension to George S. Robinson (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (S. 2334) for the relief of W. M. Stevens (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. CURTIS:

A bill (S. 2335) authorizing the President of the United States to appoint Ensign O. C. F. Dodge, United States Navy, now on the retired list, a lieutenant on the retired list; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

A bill (S. 2336) to correct the military record of Alfred E. Lewis; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. 2337) granting a pension to William Richardson (with accompanying paper);

A bill (S. 2338) granting a pension to Perry Abbett (with accompanying paper);

A bill (S. 2339) granting an increase of pension to William H. H. Miller;

A bill (S. 2340) granting a pension to Caroline Atkinson;

A bill (S. 2341) granting an increase of pension to Eli Sherman;

A bill (S. 2342) granting an increase of pension to Joel H. Shamel; and

A bill (S. 2343) granting an increase of pension to Joseph Cooper; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. GORE (for Mr. OWEN) (by request):

A bill (S. 2344) to pay the balance due the loyal Creek Indians on the award made them by the Senate on the 16th day of February, 1903; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. GALLINGER:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 25) to amend an act entitled "An act to enable any State to cooperate with any other State or States, or with the United States, for the protection of the watersheds of navigable streams, and to appoint a commission for the acquisition of lands for the purpose of conserving the navigability of navigable rivers," approved March 1, 1911; to the Committee on Forest Reservations and the Protection of Game.

By Mr. WORKS:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 26) authorizing the President to invite the Republic of Mexico and the Republics of Central and South America to participate in the Panama-California Exposition in 1915, at San Diego, Cal.; to the Committee on Industrial Expositions.

RECIPROCITY WITH CANADA.

Mr. CRAWFORD submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 4412) to promote reciprocal trade relations with the Dominion of Canada, and for other purposes, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I ask that the amendment lie on the table, and I wish to state that at the next regular session, after the close of the morning business, should I be able to do so, I will make some observations upon it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will lie on the table, without objection.

Mr. McCUMBER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 4412) to promote reciprocal trade relations with the Dominion of Canada, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. BRADLEY, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of Cornelius C. Vaughan, S. 187, Sixty-second Congress, be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, no adverse report having been made thereon.

Ordered, That the papers in the case of Rutherford H. Howell, S. 5033, Sixty-first Congress, be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, no adverse report having been made thereon.

REPORT ON SEIZURES OF COTTON.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I offer the following order and ask for its present consideration.

The order was read, as follows:

Ordered, That 1,000 copies of Senate Document No. 23, Forty-third Congress, second session, entitled "Report of the Acting Secretary of the Treasury," be printed for the use of the Senate document room.

Mr. SMOOT. I can not call to mind what the document is, I should like to ask the Senator to state its purport.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. It is the report of the Secretary of the Treasury in reference to cotton seized and sold and the proceeds paid into the Treasury, giving the names of the owners. The edition has been completely exhausted, and additional legislation is very much needed.

Mr. SMOOT. I will not object.

The order was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

THE CONGRESSIONAL DIRECTORY.

Mr. SMOOT submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 42), which was read and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay from the contingent fund the compensation usually allowed for compiling, editing, and indexing the edition of the Congressional Directory for the first session of the Sixty-second Congress as prepared and published under the direction of the Joint Committee on Printing.

RULINGS OF POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

On motion of Mr. SMOOT, it was Ordered, That 3,000 copies of Senate Document No. 26, Sixty-second Congress, first session, Rulings of Post Office Department, be printed for the use of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

WOOD AND WOOD PULP.

Mr. LODGE. I send to the desk and ask to have printed as a Senate document (S. Doc. No. 28) copies of the acts of the different Provinces of Canada regarding the exportation of wood and manufacture of spruce and other pulp wood cut on the Crown lands. They consist of extracts or complete copies of the acts.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the order will be entered. No objection is heard.

OREGON AND CALIFORNIA RAILROAD GRANTS.

Mr. NELSON. I ask unanimous consent that the opinion of the United States circuit court in the matter of the Oregon and California railroad grants, a suit instituted pursuant to a joint resolution of Congress, be printed as a Senate document (S. Doc. No. 27).

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the order will be entered as requested. The Chair hears none.

MOBILE (ALA.) BICENTENNIAL.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 8) of the House of Representatives, which was read and referred to the Committee on Industrial Expositions:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the resolution passed by the Legislature of Alabama in regard to the Bicentennial celebration at Mobile on May 26, 1911, be received. The said resolution reads as follows:

"Senate joint resolution 52.

"[No. 241.]

"Whereas this year, 1911, is the two hundredth anniversary of the foundation and settlement of the city of Mobile, first capital of La Province de la Louisane in 1711; and

"Whereas the city of Mobile and her people are making preparation for celebrating the event: Therefore be it

"Resolved by the senate of Alabama (the house of representatives concurring), That the Legislature of Alabama does hereby request the Senators and Representatives in Congress from the State of Alabama to bring the said anniversary celebration to the attention of Congress and the several departments of the United States Government and the representatives at Washington of foreign powers.

"Approved, April 6, 1911."

Be it further resolved, That the Congress of the United States acknowledges with pleasure the receipt of said resolution and appreciates the courtesy of the notice extended of that important event in the Nation's history.

Resolved further, That we commend the action of the city of Mobile in making preparations for this celebration. We regard that territory as one of the most valuable acquisitions of the Government and congratulate Alabama and the people of Mobile upon her growth as a city, and extend our best wishes for a successful celebration and a large attendance of patriotic American citizens.

Resolved further, That a copy of these resolutions be forwarded to the mayor of the city of Mobile in evidence of our appreciation of the work that will be done on May 26, 1911, in commemoration of the founding and settlement of our beautiful and progressive city on the Gulf.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LODGE in the chair). The morning business is concluded.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the election of a President pro tempore of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois moves, in the absence of the Vice President, that the Senate proceed to the election of a President pro tempore of the Senate.

Mr. STONE. I ask the Senator to withhold that business for a few moments. I desire to speak for a very brief space of time on a matter that partakes largely of a personal question,

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is also a notice, which appears on the calendar, by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS], that he would address the Senate this morning. But the Senate will understand that the motion of the Senator from Illinois is not debatable, and it is a privileged motion, the Chair takes it.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope the Senator from Missouri will defer his request.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I ask the Senator from Illinois whether he will not withhold his motion for a while? It is my purpose to address the Senate this morning.

Mr. CULLOM. I think it would be better to go on with this matter and dispose of it.

Mr. STONE. I desire merely to make a statement of about five or six minutes in length; not more than that.

Mr. CULLOM. Very well; I will yield until the Senator from Missouri makes his brief statement of a personal nature, as he states it to be.

FARM WAGES IN THE UNITED STATES AND CANADA.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, in a speech I delivered in the Senate on the 1st of the present month in support of the Canadian reciprocity agreement, and while discussing the question of comparative wages paid farm laborers in the United States and Canada, I had occasion to quote from a report made on that subject by the Tariff Board. In that report there are tables in which the average wages paid to such laborers in the American States and the wages paid in the Canadian Provinces are given. As appeared from a footnote to one of those tables, the Tariff Board had obtained their information as to Canadian wages, in part at least, from a report made by the agricultural department of Canada and published in the Census and Statistics Monthly, a periodical issued under the auspices of that department. On examining the tables prepared by the Tariff Board and the table prepared by the Canadian agricultural department it seemed manifest to me that the Tariff Board, in determining the wages paid Canadian farm laborers, had deducted the value of the laborer's board from the total given as his wage in the Canadian publication referred to, and had stated the remainder to be the sum received for his work per month or year. I went on to say that while it appeared from these reports that the Tariff Board had deducted the monthly board of the Canadian laborer from his monthly wage, the same course had not been pursued with respect to American farm laborers. I called attention to this as a mistake made by the Tariff Board in fixing the wages received by farm laborers in Canada.

Several days after the delivery of that speech the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] and I had a conference with Prof. Emery, chairman of the Tariff Board, in the Senate Office Building. At that conference Prof. Emery exhibited to us a letter written on April 12, 1911, to Jesse E. Pope, who is in some way connected with the Tariff Board, by the chief officer of the Canadian census and statistics office, which I will ask the Secretary to read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read as requested:

The Secretary read as follows:

CENSUS AND STATISTICS OFFICE,
Ottawa, April 12, 1911.

DEAR SIR: In reply to your letter of the 7th instant, the meaning of the statement "average wages of farm help, including board," is that the estimated value of the board is added to wages received in cash. Thus, $35.15 being the average per month for the summer season for Canada in 1910 and $12.49 the estimated average value of the board, the average wages in cash would be represented by the difference, viz, $22.66.

I inclose herewith a copy of the schedule issued to correspondents in which the point is made quite clear to them. This schedule was issued to all correspondents throughout Canada, and there is no difference in the way the statistics are compiled, as between east and west, but wages and board values increase in value the farther one proceeds west.

Yours, very truly,

A. BLUE, Chief Officer.

JESSE E. POPE, Esq.,
Tariff Board, Treasury Building,
Washington, D. C.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I will now read an extract from the schedule referred to in the letter:

Wages for farm help relate to hired men working on the land or taking care of stock, etc., and include as part of the wage an allowance for board in each case. For example, if the hired man was paid $20 per month for his services and was also provided with board and lodging, the correspondent should add to the $20 an amount equivalent to the cost of board and lodging.

Mr. President, after reading this letter and these instructions and after hearing Prof. Emery's explanation, I became satisfied that the course taken by the Tariff Board in subtracting the estimated monthly board of the Canadian laborer, as given by the Canadian officials, from his monthly wage was proper. It was proper because the sum of both amounts was stated in the Canadian table as the amount received by the laborer per month. I was misled by the form in which the Tariff Board stated the amount of the wage received. The Tariff Board stated it in this way: "Amount received with board," and then gave the sum obtained after deducting the board from the total as given in the Canadian report. In the Canadian report it was stated in this way: "Amount received, including board," and then giving the sum obtained by adding the board to the wage. The Tariff Board gave the amount of the wage "with board," while the Canadian table gave the amount of the wage "including board." Failing to catch on to this fine and more than half concealed distinction between the two expressions, I was misled, as were other Senators. Almost any man, except perhaps an expert statistician, would fail to detect the razor-edge distinction between the two expressions. Nevertheless, after hearing Prof. Emery's explanation, I am satisfied that the distinction should be made. And hence I now say that what the Tariff Board did in this respect was properly done. It is unfortunate that the Tariff Board did not incorporate in its report the substance of the explanatory papers Prof. Emery exhibited to the Senator from Iowa and me, for if that had been done the Senator from Iowa, the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], and other Senators who examined these several reports, as well as myself, would not have fallen into the error we did regarding the work of the board.

Mr. President, I take pleasure in making this explanation to the Senate, for I not only do not wish to do the Tariff Board or any official injustice, but I am gratified to find that in the real substance of the matter the board did not commit the error we ascribed to them. I would have made this explanation sooner, except for the fact that on the evening of the very day we held this conference with Prof. Emery the Senator from Iowa was obliged to leave the city and did not return until Friday last. He expressed a preference to me that we should make our statements respecting this matter at the same time, and out of courtesy to him I have deferred saying what I have until now. Furthermore, I have withheld the publication in the RECORD of the speech in which I called attention to this matter in the first instance, so that it might go out simultaneously with the explanations the Senator from Iowa and I desired to make; hence the entire matter will appear in to-morrow morning's RECORD.

A word more, Mr. President, before I conclude. I wish now to say that this correction does not materially affect the argument I made on Monday, the 1st instant. My contention then was to the effect that the average wages paid farm laborers in Canada were not below the average wages paid farm laborers in the United States. I sought to show this in two ways: First and chiefly, by quoting from wage tables published by the Agricultural Department and the Tariff Board of the United States; and, second, by again quoting from the same wage tables in connection with a wage table published by the Canadian Government. I proved beyond dispute that if the statistics furnished by our own Agricultural Department and Tariff Board are reliable, then, based on those statistics alone, the average Canadian wage paid for farm labor was slightly higher than the average wage paid for such labor in this country.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. STONE. If the Senator will pardon me, I am about through. I will then listen to what he has to say.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I wanted to ask a question on the very point the Senator was emphasizing.

Mr. STONE. All I have to say covers that very point.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No.

Mr. STONE. Well, let the Senator proceed.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I should like to direct the Senator's attention to the fact that the Canadian communication regarding the wages of farm labor, which was read from the Secretary's desk, states $35.15 as being the average wage per month for the summer season in Canada, which includes $12 for board—not for the year, but for the summer season. I should like to ask the Senator from Missouri if he knows whether the figure given is for the harvest time only or not? The statement of the writer is very clear.

Mr. STONE. Oh, Mr. President, the letter read from the Secretary's desk is simply a letter from the officer in charge of statistics in Canada, explaining to the Tariff Board how the wage table was made up.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. But, if the Senator from Missouri will permit me, I should like to emphasize the fact that that communication pretends to give the wages paid, including board, for farm labor in Canada during the summer season.

Mr. STONE. Certainly; that is what it gives.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And I dare say, although I am not quite sure about it, that the wages of the American farm laborer are given for a whole year.

Mr. STONE. Oh, Mr. President, that is incorrect, for the tables I read in the speech I made before the Senate two weeks ago referred to and covered wages paid both in Canada and in the United States by the season and by the year.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. This communication does not state that.

Mr. STONE. This communication does not cover all that. This communication was simply to show the manner of making the table, whether made for the year or for the season. It in no sense conflicts with the tables I produced in the hearing of the Senate two weeks ago. The main body of my argument at that time was predicated on the statistics furnished by our own Government. I thought that those who heard me or should read what I said, especially Republicans, would be less likely to dispute the accuracy of statistics furnished by our own officials, appointed and holding office under a Republican administration, than they would be to dispute statistics tabulated by the Canadian Government. Having shown by these statistics, prepared by our own Government, that the Canadian wage is equal to and a little above the American wage, I then took up the Canadian statistics, and, coupling them with our own statistics, I proceeded to show that on that basis the wages paid in Canada were, in fact, considerably and appreciably higher than in the States. This latter argument I now withdraw for the reasons stated, but the other stands unshaken and undisturbed. It still remains that, according to the statistics gathered and published alone by our own officials, the wage paid to farm laborers in Canada is above and not below the wage paid in the United States.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, I renew my motion that the Senate proceed to the election of a President pro tempore.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois moves that the Senate proceed to the election of a President pro tempore.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is not a debatable motion.

Mr. CUMMINS. I hope, however, the same courtesy will be extended to me that has been given to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE], inasmuch as I am as guilty as he, if either of us is guilty, with respect to the matter of which he has been speaking. I desire just a moment.

Mr. CULLOM. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, during the course of the debate referred to by the Senator from Missouri, in which I took a little part, I doubted—and expressed the doubt—the accuracy of the tables prepared by the Tariff Board. My doubt arose upon an interpretation of the titles or the headings which had been attached to the table by the board. The Senator from Missouri has already explained the character of the titles. I desire to say—and I say it in justice to the Tariff Board—that a subsequent examination and conference with Prof. Emery, the head of the board, has convinced me that I was in error with respect to my interpretation of the language at the head of the table, and I have become convinced that the table is accurate. I want to express that conviction as publicly and as emphatically as I originally expressed my doubt of its accuracy.

I do not need to go further into the discussion of the matter. I am not concerned at this time with regard to the merits of the argument or what these facts may establish. All that I desire to do is to withdraw the expression of doubt that I then felt with regard to the accuracy of the table itself.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. CULLOM. I yield now to the Senator from Utah, who desires to make a brief statement on the same subject concerning which the Senator from Missouri and the Senator from Iowa have spoken.

Mr. SMOOT. I assure the Senator that I will be very brief indeed; in fact, I will only occupy a moment.

I wish to state, and to acknowledge, as the other two Senators have done, that in the examination of the report made by the Tariff Board I also was mistaken. I believe that almost any Senator examining the two reports would have been misled under similar circumstances. I had no desire other than to reach the facts, and I am very pleased, indeed, to find that our Tariff Board report is correct. The explanation made by Prof. Emery is perfectly satisfactory, and I wish to make that announcement.

ELECTION OF PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the election of a President pro tempore.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will proceed to the election of a President pro tempore.

The Chair desires to say, before action is taken, that on Thursday last the Senate, by unanimous consent, suspended clause 2 of Rule I, which provides that the Secretary shall take the chair pending the election of a President pro tempore, and continued in the chair its present occupant. Whether that action was intended to be continuous, covering all proceedings connected with the election of a President pro tempore or was for that day only, it is not for the Chair to determine. It is for the Senate to determine that question before we proceed further.

Mr. SHIVELY. I ask unanimous consent that clause 2 of Rule I be suspended and that the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] occupy the chair during the proceedings to elect a President pro tempore.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana moves that the present occupant of the chair continue to occupy it during the proceedings——

Mr. SHIVELY. If the Chair please, I made no motion. I asked unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana asks unanimous consent that clause 2 of Rule I be suspended, and that the present occupant of the chair continue to occupy it during the proceedings connected with the election of a President pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask for a roll call.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BACON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE]. I transfer it to the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] and vote for the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN].

Mr. LA FOLLETTE (when Mr. BOURNE's name was called). The senior Senator from Oregon is unavoidably absent. I desire to state that if he were present he would vote for the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP].

Mr. BROWN (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama (when the name of Mr. DAVIS was called). I desire to state that the junior Senator from Arkansas is paired on this question with the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LORIMER]. I shall make no further statement of the pair during the proceedings.

Mr. DILLINGHAM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], which I transfer to the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON], and to prevent repetition I make this announcement for all votes to-day. I vote for the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER].

Mr. GUGGENHEIM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. PAYNTER], and therefore withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote I should vote for the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER].

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LODGE, when his name was called). I have a pair for this day with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN]. If he were present he would vote for the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], and I should vote for the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. I make this announcement for the day.

Mr. McCUMBER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. PERCY]. Having no opportunity to transfer the pair, I wish to announce now that I will withhold my vote on this question to-day.

Mr. SHIVELY (when the name of Mr. MARTIN of Virginia was called). I announce that the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] has been unexpectedly called from the Senate and can not be present during the proceedings to-day. As just stated by the Chair, the senior Senator from Virginia is paired with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. If the senior Senator from Virginia were present he would vote for the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON]. I wish this announcement to stand for the day.

The roll call, having been concluded, resulted as follows:

FOR MR. BACON—33.

Bailey	Hitchcock	Overman	Swanson
Bankhead	Johnson, Me.	Pomerene	Taylor

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy-six Senators have voted; 39 necessary for a choice. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] has 33; the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], 33; the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP], 7; the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], 1; the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW], 1; and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], 1. There is no choice. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BACON (when his name was called). Announcing for the succeeding votes the transfer of the pair which I have already announced, I again vote for the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN].

Mr. BROWN (when his name was called). I again announce the fact of my pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE]. I make this announcement for the rest of the day on this question.

The roll call, having been concluded, resulted:

FOR MR. BACON—33.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy-six Senators have voted; necessary to a choice, 39. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] received 33 votes; the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], 33; the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP], 7; the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], 1; the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], 1; and the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW], 1. There is no choice.

ELECTION OF SENATORS BY DIRECT VOTE.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Is it in order at this time to move to take up a matter for consideration under Rule VIII?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks it would be in order to lay aside the present order of the Senate and supersede it by any motion.

Mr. BORAH. I move that the Senate take up for consideration House joint resolution 39.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House joint resolution 39. The Secretary will read the title.

The SECRETARY. A joint resolution (H. J. Res. 39) proposing an amendment to the Constitution providing that Senators shall be elected by the people of the several States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Idaho.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the joint resolution.

The Secretary read the joint resolution, reported without amendment from the Committee on the Judiciary May 1, 1911, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That in lieu of the first paragraph of section 3 of Article I of the Constitution of the United States, and in lieu of so much of paragraph 2 of the same section as relates to the filling of vacancies, and in lieu of all of paragraph 1 of section 4 of said Article I, in so far as the same relates to any authority in Congress to make or alter regulations as to the times or manner of holding elections for Senators, the following be proposed as an amendment to the Constitution, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the States:

"The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, elected by the people thereof, for six years; and each Senator shall have one vote. The electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislature.

"The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators shall be as prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof.

"When vacancies happen in the representation of any State in the Senate, the executive authority of such State shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies: Provided, That the legislature of any State may empower the executive thereof to make temporary appointments until the people fill the vacancies by election, as the legislature may direct.

"This amendment shall not be so construed as to affect the election or term of any Senator chosen before it becomes valid as part of the Constitution."

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I presented certain resolutions at the last session of the Senate and gave notice that I would address the Senate upon them to-day at the close of the morning business.

Mr. BRISTOW. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. BRISTOW. I desire to offer the following amendment as a substitute for the pending joint resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas offers an amendment to House joint resolution 39, which the Senate has just taken up. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. It proposes to strike out all after the resolving clause and to insert:

That in lieu of the first paragraph of section 3 of Article I of the Constitution of the United States, and in lieu of so much of paragraph 2 of the same section as relates to the filling of vacancies, the following be proposed as an amendment to the Constitution, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the States:

"The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, elected by the people thereof, for six years; and each Senator shall have one vote. The electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislatures.

"When vacancies happen in the representation of any State in the Senate, the executive authority of such State shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies: Provided, That the legislature of any State may empower the executive thereof to make temporary appointments until the people fill the vacancies by election as the legislature may direct.

"This amendment shall not be so construed as to affect the election or term of any Senator chosen before it becomes valid as part of the Constitution."

BUSINESS OF THE SESSION.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, at the last session of the Senate I offered a resolution regarding a legislative program for the extra session and gave notice that I would address the Senate upon the resolution to-day. If there is no objection, I will avail myself of the opportunity which I intended to take at the close of the morning business. I will first ask the Secretary to read the resolution to which I refer, Senate resolution 41.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, Senate resolution 41 will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read Senate resolution 41, submitted by Mr. NEWLANDS on the 11th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that during the extra session legislation should be enacted upon the following subjects:

First. The Canadian reciprocity bill.

Second. Enlarging the free list of importations.

Third. The reduction of the excessive duties in the wool, cotton, and steel schedules.

Fourth. The gradual reduction of all duties of a prohibitory character to a revenue basis.

Fifth. The immediate reduction of the appropriations for military and naval expenses for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1912, to the extent of $30,000,000, such reduction to be apportioned by the President with the aid of a military board or boards.

Sixth. A graduated increase in the corporation tax sufficient to make up any deficit caused by a reduction in customs duties, and also sufficient to provide a fund for the regulation of river flow and the promotion of river navigation.

Seventh. Publicity of campaign expenditures before the election and prohibiting contributions by corporations.

Eighth. Providing for the election of United States Senators by popular vote.

Ninth. Providing for the immediate admission of Arizona and New Mexico as separate States.

And that during the extra session the proper committees should consider and report for action, during the next regular session, legislation upon the following subjects:

First. Providing for the physical valuation and the control of the stock and bond issues of railroads engaged in interstate commerce.

Second. Providing, in connection with the Bureau of Corporations, for a board of interstate trade with powers of examination, condemnation, and recommendation regarding interstate trade similar to those conferred upon the Interstate Commerce Commission regarding interstate transportation.

Third. Providing for the protection of bank depositors and the minimizing of bank panics by the organization of a national reserve association in each State, in which the national banks and the State banks engaged in interstate commerce shall be stockholders, such national reserve associations to have ample capital and reserves and to take over the note-issuing functions now enjoyed by the national banks, including the power to issue emergency currency; such associations to have the power to insure or guarantee the depositors of their constituent banks, and in connection therewith powers of examination of such banks; such associations to be brought into federation through a national banking board fairly representative of the different sections of the country, one-half of which shall be selected by such associations and one-half by the President of the United States; and such board to be advisory to the Congress and to the President.

Fourth. Providing for the neutralization of the Philippine Islands with a view to recognizing their independence as soon as a stable government can be established.

Fifth. Providing for the cooperation of the National Government with the States in devising and carrying out comprehensive plans for the regulation of river flow, with a view to the promotion of navigation and the prevention of destructive floods through the preservation of forests, the storage and use of flood waters for the irrigation of arid lands, and the storage of flood waters for the development of water power; and providing a fund ample for continuous work, to be conducted under the direction of a board of experts authorized by law.

Sixth. Providing for the protection of our natural resources in timber, coal, iron, and oil against monopolistic control.

Seventh. Providing for the upbuilding of the American merchant marine by free entry to American registry of all ships, wherever constructed, and by the construction of auxiliary ships for our Navy, to be used in time of war in aid of the fighting ships, and in time of peace in establishing new routes of commerce through lease to shipping companies; such legislation to involve the temporary diminution of the construction of fighting ships and the substitution of auxiliary ships, with a view to the creation of a well-proportioned and self-sustaining Navy.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, an extra session of the Congress of the United States has been called by the President for the purpose of considering a reciprocity treaty with Canada, and the question now before the Congress is as to whether it shall confine itself to the consideration of that treaty or shall take up other legislation upon matters of vital interest to the country upon which public opinion has been formed.

There can be, Mr. President, no more favorable opportunity for cleaning up the legislation of Congress relating to matters of progressive reform than at this extra session, for the appropriation bills, which always have the right of way and which absorb the attention of Congress during its regular session, will not be before us.

In the resolutions which I have presented I have endeavored to cover two classes of legislation: First, the legislation which is pressing and which should be enacted at this session; second, bills which should be considered by committees and reported for action at the regular session in December next.

LITTLE PROGRESS MADE.

Now, Mr. President, in looking over the history of our congressional legislation we will find that really very little progress has been made in matters of reform. We have been endeavoring to reduce the excessive duties of the tariff for over 40 years and thus far have made substantially no progress. On the contrary, until recently, the tariff duties have been constantly increased during that period. At the last session at which action was taken upon this subject, only a few modifications and reductions of the tariff were made—modifications and reductions which were entirely unsatisfactory to the country—and the result was a political revolution at the last election.

We have before us, therefore, the tariff as an unsettled question, and the inquiry arises as to whether we can not do something substantial at this session of Congress regarding a reduction of excessive duties. The House of Representatives is now Democratic. It can easily put into the shape of legislation its views upon the tariff question. The Senate is now progressive in character, while hitherto it has been reactionary in character.

The advent into this body of about 13 progressive Republicans and the increase in the Democratic minority has now made it possible for a progressive majority in this body to accomplish what the progressives in this body were unable to accomplish two years ago, and whilst it will be impossible to put upon the statute books a tariff bill entirely satisfactory to the Democratic Party, a tariff bill can be enacted which will relieve tariff exactions and which will result not only in the enlargement of the free list, but in a substantial reduction of the wool, the steel, and the cotton schedules, and which will result in the reduction of duties now of a prohibitory character to a revenue basis.

If the Senate were called upon to-day to vote upon the reductions urged by the progressive Republican leaders two years ago, nearly every one of the amendments which they offered could be adopted, because the progressives, composed of progressive Republicans and Democrats, constitute a clear majority of this body.

Now, the word has gone out that we are to do nothing; that Congress will adjourn practically without action except possibly upon the reciprocity agreement. This view is sedulously urged by many of the newspapers of the country, and public opinion is gradually forming upon the line that nothing will be done at this session. If nothing is done it will be because the progressives of this body, composed of Democrats and progressive Republicans, conclude that nothing shall be done, and the responsibility will rest with them and not with the reactionary element of this body.

IMPORTANT QUESTIONS UNSETTLED.

Mr. President, what questions are before the country that are unsettled with reference to which public opinion is now made up? First, let me recall how little substantial progress has been made. We have made substantially no progress in the reform of the tariff. In legislation relating to interstate commerce, involving three branches—interstate transportation, interstate trade, and interstate exchange—little progress whatever has been made except regarding interstate transportation, though the trust question and the banking question have been as urgent as that of transportation itself, and in transportation the full limit of accomplishment has not been reached. It took us nearly 20 years after the passage of the interstate-commerce act to give the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to fix a rate and to act upon its own initiative. Practically prior to that time their entire powers were those of recommendation, and though they urged upon Congress year after year the enactment of needed legislation enlarging their powers, they secured response only within the last six years under the lead of a strenuous President, who, backed by public opinion, forced progressive legislation through Congress.

VALUATION OF RAILROADS.

In interstate transportation, the valuation and the control of the stock and bond issues of interstate railroads by the Interstate Commerce Commission are as yet unauthorized, although public opinion was made up upon these questions years ago. Congress, as the faithful chronicler and recorder of public opinion, should long since have put these measures upon the statute books.

Why should we delay longer giving the power to the Interstate Commerce Commission to make a valuation of railroads engaged in interstate commerce? Why should we longer delay giving them the power to control the stock and bond issues of such railroads? The Supreme Court of the United States has determined that in the adjustment of rates the fair valuation of the railroads, their capital, and other elements are to be had in view. Can we deny fairly to this commission the power to make a valuation, when the Supreme Court says that a fair valuation is one of the elements to be considered in rate fixing, and can we deny them the power to determine the fair and honest capitalization in stock and bonds when the Supreme Court has determined that these matters are involved in rate fixing? In common honesty, should we not immediately put upon the statute books legislation upon these subjects?

Shall we permit the conditions to continue to which the Interstate Commerce Commission referred in its report of two years ago, giving as an instance the fact that in the Spokane case the Northern Pacific and Great Northern Railways had recently presented a valuation 25 per cent in excess of that claimed by them in a similar case a short time before? Is it fair to the people to deny to the commission the power and the means to meet such a condition?

TRUSTS.

So, with reference to the trusts, these great combinations of capital which have grown every day stronger and more powerful as the agitation against their abuses has progressed. The public mind has been made up upon this question for years, and yet we have enacted practically no legislation regarding them since the passage of the Sherman Act. If these great trusts should be dissolved by the Supreme Court in pending cases, it will be necessary to take hold of the question as to what the limit of size and capitalization shall be. If, however, they should be sustained, then it will be essential that we should regulate and control them as public monopolies.

INTERSTATE TRADE.

Why have we not long before, with reference to this branch of interstate commerce, namely, interstate trade, organized a trade or industrial commission similar to the Interstate Commerce Commission, with powers of recommendation, with powers of condemnation, with powers of correction similar to those enjoyed by the Interstate Commerce Commission regarding interstate transportation? Under the process of evolution that body has worked out a system of law regarding these great railroads that has cured great abuses, that has steadied the finances of the railroads, that has created the confidence of the country and created the confidence of the railroad managers themselves, so that to-day there is not a railway manager of prominence in the country who would wipe off of the statute books the legislation which we have enacted, but, on the contrary, these managers, who attacked these measures prior to their enactment, now acquiesce in them and declare that they have been beneficial in their operation.

This great evolution has been crowned by a recent illuminating decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission, through Commissioner Lane, a decision which ranks with the great state papers, and a decision which has settled vital questions connected with this subject so satisfactorily that whilst the public interest has been sustained, it has been accomplished without a ripple in the market, without disturbing a single value; but, on the contrary, assurance to investors throughout the world has been given that whilst this commission is regardful of private right and public right, it is also regardful of the property rights of the railroads themselves. Is there not similar legislation upon the subject of interstate trade, involving the great trusts upon which we can enter with propriety and with safety?

BANKING.

So it is with banking. For years Congress has been enacting laws regarding banking, always with a view to giving the bankers themselves larger privileges, never with a view to protecting depositors and the public at large. The former chairman of our Finance Committee, under whose administration these abuses had been allowed to continue, declared recently that the banking system of the United States was the worst in the civilized world. Banking is a branch of interstate commerce so far as interstate exchange is concerned.

The powers of the National Government over interstate exchange are just as absolute as they are over interstate transportation or interstate trade, yet we have permitted year after year these abuses to exist. We have permitted constant breaks in the exchanges of the country just as intolerable as would be constant breaks in the transportation of the country and just as easily guarded against as would be breaks in transportation. With what tolerance would we view a condition of things under which 10 miles of track would be taken out of each one of the great transcontinental railways of the country at intervals, and interstate transportation be thus disturbed and delayed? With what tolerance would we view the destruction of great railway bridges to the prejudice of interstate commerce? With what tolerance would we view a system under which the railway cars of this country could be drifted to the city of New York and there held for storage purposes, for hire as storage warehouses, when the entire country needed them for the moving of crops? Yet we have permitted this with reference to interstate exchange; we have permitted the reserves of the entire country under our system of law to gravitate to New York, to be used there not for the proper function of banking exchange but for promotion and speculation.

Then, when the moneys have been tied up there and the country banks have asked for them in order to move the crops of the country, the return of the reserves is denied upon the ground that the withdrawal of those moneys from speculation would bring down the stock market in ruins upon New York and would bring about a destruction of values throughout the entire country; yet it only requires a little legislation, the compelling of these banks to maintain a proper proportion between their capital and their obligations, a thing concerning which there is no injunction now in our present banking law; it will only require a little care regarding reserves, the compelling of country banks to keep in their vaults the larger proportion of their reserves, and preventing them from sending them to New York; it will only require legislation which will bind them together into one great strong body in each of the States for the purpose of mutually insuring bank depositors to prevent these disastrous breaks in exchange, which, resulting from local bank panics here and there, tie up the production and trade of the country and inflict irremediable loss upon enterprise and business throughout the country.

Mr. President, interstate commerce, embracing these three subjects—interstate transportation, interstate trade, and interstate exchange—has only been partially legislated upon, successfully so with reference to interstate transportation; not at all with reference to interstate trade and interstate exchange; and yet the latter two are just as important to the prosperity of the country as is the former, and the country can be as easily protected by proper legislation relating to them as it can be protected against the abuses of transportation.

How have we done this with reference to transportation? Not by ourselves fixing rates, not by ourselves endeavoring to correct every abuse, as we would have the right to do, but by creating an Interstate Commerce Commission as the servant of Congress, to carry out its will under rules fixed by Congress, thus creating a body of intelligent, capable men under the sanction of an oath, acting in a semijudicial capacity, who devote their lives to the scientific study of these questions and are not distracted, as we are, by numerous other duties.

Mr. President, I have referred in my resolution to the legislation which should be enacted during this session. First, the Canadian reciprocity bill; second, a bill enlarging the free list of importations; third, a bill reducing the excessive duties in the wool, cotton, and steel schedules; fourth, a bill reducing all duties of a prohibitory character to a revenue basis. By that I do not mean that it would be possible for us to pass a bill that would not be of a protective character. Of course, it would be impossible in this body to pass a bill that would not embrace the protective principle, for there are not enough Democrats to pass a purely revenue measure; but whatever progressive measure is passed, must be passed with the acquiescence of the 13 Republican Senators who are progressive in character, who believe in the protective system, but favor the correction of its abuses. They, by reason of their convictions, can not go as far as we would in the way of reduction, but we certainly can go as far as they would in the way of reduction. They are not willing to go as far as we are; we are willing to go further than they are; but if they are willing to make any reduction, would it not be good Democratic policy, if we can not pass a Democratic measure, to ask these progressive Republicans to shape a bill reducing excessive and prohibitory duties and then stand behind it and support it?

WHO ARE THE PROGRESSIVES?

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, would the Senator object to a slight interruption?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRANDEGEE in the chair). Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to inquire as to the Senator's understanding of the meaning in a political sense of the word "progressive" as used by those on either side who claim to be progressive.

Mr. NEWLANDS. My idea of a progressive is a man who stands for the correction of existing abuses.

Mr. HEYBURN. Well, does the Senator include those who sit on this side of the Chamber in part under the designation as progressives?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Part of them; yes.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then, all others except them are not progressives?

Mr. NEWLANDS. They vary in degree [laughter], some of them being near progressives, others being regular, others stalwart, others reactionary, but all standing together against real progressive action in the interest of the people.

Mr. HEYBURN. Well, Mr. President, the Senator used the term a few moments ago in connection with the word "reformer." Does he consider the progressives reformers?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do in the main; but of course——

Mr. HEYBURN. Does the Senator mean by "reformer" a man who is in favor of reforming the ranks and the direction that the ranks in the Army are taking; that is, reforming by the first order, "right about face, forward, march," and march away from all the great measures that they have been pretending for years to advocate? I merely inquire for information.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I can not follow the Senator in his last refinement. It is very apparent that every legislative body is now being divided, not by the old political lines, but by adherence on the one side to old traditions of party faith or of party action, and on the other side to the new principles, which are really old, based upon equality of opportunity, honesty, and economy in public expenditure. So party lines are gradually being effaced in the public eye. The country does not care much now as to whether we act as Democrats or Republicans.

It wants to know our position upon specific public questions. Are we for or against the correction of transportation abuses? Are we for or against monopolistic abuses? Are we for or against banking abuses? Are we for honest, unbribed, and uncontrolled elections? Are we for or against great constructive measures, such as the regulation of our river flow and the promotion of navigation? Are we for or against the protection of our natural resources in timber, coal, iron, and oil against monopolistic control? Are we for or against providing for the election of United States Senators by popular vote? Are we for or against an income tax? Are we for or against the corporation tax? Are we for or against, if our legislation regarding the tariff results in a deficit in revenue, in an increase in the corporation tax to meet the deficit? These are questions which are being discussed in the magazines and the newspapers of the country and upon the rostrum everywhere, and it is with reference to these questions, and not mere party names, that men to-day are being judged.

REDUCTION OF ARMY AND NAVY EXPENSES.

Mr. President, when I was interrupted I was about to call attention to the fifth subject concerning which it seemed to me legislation should be enacted, and that was the diminution, the reduction of the appropriations for the military and naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1912. Those appropriations to-day aggregate over $230,000,000, and a question which we could well take hold of at this extra session would be as to whether we should not by action now absolutely reduce that expenditure at least $30,000,000, giving the President power, with the aid of military boards, to apportion the reduction.

For my part I think Congress has always gone too much into detail in its appropriations. If to-day we were to give a lump appropriation, $10,000,000 less to the War Department, and ten, fifteen, or twenty million dollars less to the Navy Department than the amounts appropriated for the next fiscal year, and allow the military and naval officers under the responsibility of their position and with their high intelligence to administer these departments according to their best judgment, I have no doubt that the public service, military and naval, would be in a better condition than it is under the present system of appropriations.

Mr. WARREN. May I ask the Senator from Nevada a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. I assume the Senator knows that the amounts he has just mentioned as the appropriations for those particular branches of the Government are made less by Congress than what the President and the administration of each one of those branches call for each year—even now.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I understand it has been the custom of these various bureaus and departments to present liberal estimates for appropriations; that each has been vying with the other in an effort to get more money out of the Public Treasury; and that each department has been vying with the other in its efforts to get——

Mr. WARREN. Our information is, especially as to those two appropriations and as to those two departments, that after the estimates were made up for the appropriation bills for the last two years the President ordered them cut down. In the case of the Army appropriation estimates they were taken back to the War Department the second time for a cutting down. So that vying with each other to obtain extra large appropriations seems to have been far in the past; and as to our late bills, they were cut, as the departments said, to the bone—cut as closely as they could be and support the Army and Navy. Then Congress took up the bills and appropriated still less.

I am not assuming to contradict the Senator. Perhaps we can make smaller appropriations, but I wish to make it plain that Congress itself is not now in the habit of appropriating more but less than the sums the President and the chiefs of the departments ask for.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes; but it has always been, as I was just about to remark before the Senator from Wyoming interrupted me——

Mr. WARREN. Then, would the Senator give them a lump sum and have them expend it as they see fit and come in, as they will do, for large deficiencies at the end of the year?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I am not at present advocating such a system, but I am simply remarking that, in my judgment, if we had for the last 10 years given each department $10,000,000 less than what has been annually appropriated and each department had been put upon its responsibility to give the best service and the best results for the sum appropriated, we would have had better results.

I believe that if we were to reduce the total appropriations of the War Department and of the Navy Department for the year ending June 30, 1912, by the sum of $30,000,000, and give them a free hand to apportion the reduction, the result would be such efficiency in both administration and construction as to give us as good results as we will have under the present appropriations.

Our whole system, I think, has been a false one. We have put the departments into competition with each other, each to secure the larger sum, and we have put the different bureaus into competition with one another. Instead of that we should have had a budget committee, which would have cooperated with the President, who has shown great zeal in an effort to diminish the expenditures of the Government. We should survey the entire field, should ascertain the amount out of the existing revenues we should give to each department its proper proportion, and then by some system of boards, acting under the President, we would secure such efficiency in administration and in construction as to give us better service and better work.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do.

Mr. BRISTOW. I should like to inquire if the Senator would have this money apportioned by the Secretaries of these departments—the heads of the departments—or by a board or a commission organized in the department?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I have not worked that out very definitely. This is a mere suggestion—as, indeed, all these items are mere suggestions—for discussion. It seems to me I should give the power to the President to organize boards in the various departments in such way as to secure this result, making them first responsible to the head of the department, and then the heads of the departments responsible to the President, all to be approved by the President. I think this is a matter of executive administration which ought to be intrusted to the President, and he ought to have as much power as possible in creating the machinery for the accomplishment of this excellent work.

Mr. BRISTOW. You would, then, appropriate a certain sum of money for the Navy and require the President to apportion the expenditure of that and hold him responsible for a proper expenditure of the fund. Is that the idea?

Mr. NEWLANDS. My proposal was with reference to the year 1912, that we should reduce the total appropriations by $30,000,000, and then let the President, with the aid of these boards, apportion the reduction amongst the various items of appropriations heretofore made, thus accomplishing substantially what the Senator suggests, but in a somewhat different way.

Mr. CLAPP. Will the Senator pardon me?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes.

THE BUDGET COMMITTEE.

Mr. CLAPP. The subject the Senator is dealing with is one that certainly is very interesting, and it is to me. I have believed for years that we could save vast sums of money if we would change our system in Congress as to dealing with appropriations. During several years I have at times talked with different Members of the Senate with respect to a plan of creating a committee to consist of the chairmen of those committees which handle appropriation bills, with the idea of coordinating those chairmen upon the proposition of taking into account the funds which were subject to use and saying to the departments how much each might have of this general fund, just as a business concern would do. No business concern on earth would think of allowing the heads of departments to come and tell how much they required, upon the supposition that what they asked for should be granted. They would lay their propositions before a special board, and that board would say, "You can have so much for this and so much for that."

The committee was formed. To begin with, a large number of Senators were put on it, making it too large, and then at the first meeting of the committee they proceeded to apportion these subjects to subcommittees, thus going around in a circle and getting just to the point they started from. I do not believe we will succeed in economizing until we have some system whereby there may be coordination, so that back of each chairman whose committee handles an appropriation bill is the declaration of these coordinated forces, with which he may meet the demands that are made upon him as chairman of that committee.

That would start in the Senate; it would probably be succeeded by the same plan in the House, and eventually there would be a coordination of the two branches. I believe yet that that is the wise, businesslike way to hold down the appropriations, and I just wanted to mention the fact that it failed, because, by putting each subject in the hands of a special subcommittee, they got right back to where they started.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes.

Mr. WARREN. The real failure of that budget committee was in another direction, although I agree to some extent with what the Senator from Minnesota has said. These appropriation bills originate in the House. They are made up there from the estimates. There is the place where a committee composed of the different chairmen of committees handling appropriations should start work. Last year we provided such a committee in the Senate. We sought individually and otherwise to have them adopt something of that kind at another place.

The matter was discussed in another part of this building, I understand, to quite a little extent, and, in fact, the failure to appoint such committee has been discussed on the floor. But they deliberately decided that they would not in this Congress or at this session appoint such a committee, and it therefore seemed useless to have such a committee on the Senate side, where we only amend the measures that come over from the House, after their refusal there, where the appropriation bills originate, to create such a committee.

Mr. CLAPP. If the Senator from Nevada will further pardon me, so far as we may be permitted in the Senate to discuss the duties of the other branch of Congress, I quite agree with the Senator from Wyoming that there ought to be a similar committee there. In fact, as I said before, it ought finally to result in one committee or association. But the amendments that are put on in the Senate are always increases, never or hardly ever decreases; and they come because the heads of the departments come to the Senate committee after the bill has passed the House and they lay before us a request for these things, and with each committee acting separately in this way it is almost impossible to hold them down. While it would not be the ultima thule of the movement, it would, in my opinion, be a good beginning and a great gain if the Senate itself should adopt that rule and carry it out.

COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC EXPENDITURES.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I quite agree with the Senator from Minnesota in his views as to the importance of a budget committee. We had hoped that that was accomplished by the appointment of the late Committee on Public Expenditures, which brought the chairmen of all the appropriation committees into coordination. But, unfortunately, the committee met but seldom. It never really got started upon the original plan, and the committee was abandoned at this session of Congress. It seems to me it would have been much better to have kept that committee in existence and to have endeavored to carry out the original plan. I have no doubt that in time our example would have been influential with the House itself, and the House would have organized a similar committee. I am told that now they are in process of organizing some committee that will bring the chairmen of the various committees practically into one organization.

As it is, we have an Appropriation Committee, which has jurisdiction over only about one-fourth, I believe, of the total expenditures of the Government. All the rest of the appropriations are handled by special committees, relating to particular subjects. It is utterly impossible, therefore, for that general Appropriation Committee to cover the entire sphere of action.

I have made this suggestion with reference to an arbitrary reduction. I admit it is rather a crude suggestion. It might be preferable for us to revise all the estimates for that year, but we would not have the time or the patience to do it, and it seems to me that the best way would be to reduce the amount arbitrarily by thirty millions or twenty millions or ten millions and set the executive department to work upon this problem and then wait for results. I believe the result would be a substantial one, and that we would have suggestions and recommendations from the executive department itself which would aid in this work of efficiency and retrenchment.

Now, Mr. President, there is another question that has been pending before the country for a long time, and that is the question of river transportation.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator from Nevada will permit me, I desire to make one suggestion which I have made heretofore when appropriations bills have been up. I think if there was some attention paid to it, it might result in a material reduction of appropriations.

The appropriation bills as they come to us are entirely general in the subjects matter appropriated for. There is a paragraph having half a dozen or a dozen different items mentioned in it, with no particular appropriation for each item, but winding up with a general appropriation of $5,000,000, we will say, for everything embraced in that paragraph, leaving it absolutely within the discretion of the departmental officers as to how they shall distribute the $5,000,000.

In addition to the danger of an abuse by the departmental officers in the distribution of that fund, the particular and vital vice of it is this, that Senators, when they come to pass upon the question whether or not that $5,000,000 should be appropriated, have no such division of the particular items and the particular appropriations relating to each item as will enable them to judge whether the appropriation is proper or improper.

Now, what is the consequence? I venture the prediction that there is not a Senator who will rise on this floor and deny that every session he sits here and sees appropriation bills passed in a hop, skip, and a jump, with not one-third of the bill read, and that he knows nothing about it when it is passed, except that it carries a total sum of $100,000,000, perhaps, passed here in the space of an hour, and sometimes less time than that.

I say that the difficulty is not that Senators are inattentive to duty, but the utter impossibility, when appropriation bills are framed in that way, without any specification of the particular appropriation for each item, of Senators ascertaining what are and what are not proper appropriations.

This matter has been up several times, and I think the Senator from Wyoming himself undertook to say at one time that he did not think there was a sufficient specification in these bills, and some of us ventured to say to him that in the future we would ask that more attention be paid to the specification of appropriations for particular subjects, and not to bring in a bill in which there is such a generalization that it is an impossibility for Senators to form an idea whether the appropriations are correct or incorrect.

As I have stated, by reason of that particular manner of framing appropriation bills, Senators are utterly unable to judge of them, and that leads to their failure to attempt to judge of them. Senators have seen time and again bills carrying $100,000,000 passed through this body in less than an hour, and sometimes, I think, in 15 or 20 minutes, and it is because of the fact that bills are so framed that it is impossible to judge whether or not the items are correctly specified and the appropriations in relation thereto properly graduated.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator from Nevada yield to me for a moment?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. I am quite generally in harmony with the Senator from Georgia, but I call his attention to the fact that these bills are made up in another place. They come to this body in a made-up form. They go to a committee which has been carefully selected in the usual way, and that committee, or one of its subcommittees, spends days and weeks, sometimes months, over each one of the bills.

Mr. GALLINGER. They first go to a subcommittee.

Mr. WARREN. They go to a subcommittee. The subcommittee summons a great many witnesses, has a stenographer, and prints and publishes all its hearings. Of course, the Senate is too busy to have them all read from the desk, but every bill should have, and I think generally does have, not only a brief report showing the figures, but also a volume of the Senate committee hearings and the hearings before the committee on the House side either accompanying it or at the command of every Senator.

On various occasions—and I recall one particular bill, that of the Navy—I have, in as many as four different years, insisted that a provision be inserted on this side stipulating that that bill should be divided as the Army bill is, so much for this branch, so much for that, so much for pay of officers, and divided up otherwise. That provision has always failed in the other House or has failed in conference.

Therefore I do not feel that the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate is the only one to blame, because, as I said, we take these bills as they come from the House. If we seek to divide them here, they consider that we are rather trespassing upon their prerogative. The bills are made up in another place. On this side they go to a subcommittee and then come before the general committee, and every Senator who brings a bill in here to manage on the floor is ready to answer all questions and make all explanations. I think the Senator will bear me out in my statement that I have always taken pleasure in explaining any bill I may have had in charge, and I think other members of the committee have done the same. But the fact is that there is a great deal of money appropriated for a great many subjects and purposes, and it is almost beyond the time and the energy of the Senate in a short session to consider every bill item by item here on the floor. However, the bills do get very thorough and careful consideration in the committee room.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

Mr. WARREN. One word more. The Senator from Nevada speaks of the amount of money appropriated, and that the Committee on Appropriations has charge of only about a third of the amount. To some extent that is true, but here is the Committee on Pensions, we will say. It has the pension appropriation bill. That bill is simply an enumeration of certain expenses which are just the estimates of the department, nothing more and nothing less. The money is made payable by law, and they follow the law. The appropriations for the Post Office Department come in largely for salaries, and so forth, and in the Army for pay of the officers and men, but the great proportion of expenses that go to the Committee on Appropriations covers the sundry civil appropriation bill, which is the omnium gatherum of everything, and all deficiencies, and all those subjects which are supposed to require closer attention. Therefore, in my judgment, the important part of what I might call the legislative appropriations, where the appropriations and legislation go together, goes before the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BACON. I want to say just one word, Mr. President. Of course, I recognize the fact that these bills are made up in the other House.

Mr. WARREN. I do not say that to make any political point at all.

Mr. BACON. No; I am not speaking about that.

Mr. WARREN. But I wish that at another place they would divide up these bills more and thus make them more easily understood by Senators who do not serve on appropriating committees.

Mr. BACON. I merely want to say, Mr. President, that I recognize the fact that the Senate has a very difficult task to perform. I know that frequently these immense bills, carrying hundreds of millions of dollars, come here in the last week of the session, and it is almost an impossibility—practically it is an impossibility—for the Senate committees to give due and proper consideration to them.

It has not been my observation that the committee has had extensive hearings upon the appropriation bills. I suppose it has been due primarily to the fact that hearings have been had in the other House, and, secondly, to the fact that there is no time for extensive examination of appropriation bills by the Senate. I have heard it stated on the floor by Senators when a bill carrying a very large amount of money came here that they had not even notice of the fact that the bill was before the committee. I have not been upon the Appropriations Committee, and I am not speaking now of my own knowledge, but I have heard others state that it is a practice—I will not say the universal practice—but it frequently occurs, due, doubtless, to the fact I have mentioned, the short time at the disposition of the committee, that the bills are taken up as sent from the subcommittee, and the general committee does not consider the bill at all except to adopt as a matter——

Mr. WARREN. Oh, no; they are never reported from the subcommittee without coming before the full committee.

Mr. BACON. I did not say that they did not come before the full committee.

Mr. WARREN. May I interrupt for just a moment?

Mr. BACON. Let me make myself clear. I mean to say that when the report of the subcommittee comes in the general committee do not themselves go through the details. Of course they accept the work of the subcommittee, but without an examination of the items.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nevada has the floor.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] is anxious to have an executive session.

The VICE PRESIDENT. To whom does the Senator from Nevada yield, if to anyone?

Mr. WARREN. I wish to say——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will wait a moment until the Chair ascertains if the Senator from Nevada yields. Does the Senator from Nevada yield, and to whom?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will yield to the Senator from Wyoming, and later to the Senator from California.

Mr. WARREN. What I wish to say is in reference to the allusion to the Senate side accepting the bills and not having hearings. It is true that when there is a failure on the other side to send us a bill until within the last 24 hours we can not have extensive hearings; but taking the bills generally—for instance, I will take the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill—I have served on the subcommittee upon that bill ever since I was placed on the Committee on Appropriations, and the shortest time I have ever known to be given to that bill has been equal to 8 or 10 days, spent in hearings and in taking evidence before the subcommittee, and, to some extent, that is true of all the other bills.

It is lamentably true that we have had at times bills reach here at so late a day that some portions had to be taken for granted, without hearings, and had to be considered at once.

Mr. BACON. The Senator will recognize the fact, I think, that the members of the committee in charge of the bills on the floor are generally a little impatient if a Senator even asks that the Clerk should read the bill without skipping. It is considered to be an unreasonable request if a Senator asks that a bill appropriating $150,000,000 be read in full. I do not think that can possibly be consistent with a proper examination of a bill and a determination as to what are proper appropriations.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. PERKINS. I do not desire to trespass upon the time of the Senator from Nevada, but I wish to call his attention to the fact that taking the naval appropriation bill as an example, that bill is made up from the estimates sent in. So it is with the agricultural appropriation bill and all the supply bills.

I have been a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs since 1893. At that time Senator McPherson, of New Jersey, was the chairman of the committee. There has not been a time since I have been a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs when the Book of Estimates has not been carefully examined. The amount for each bureau, the number of clerks, and the money to be expended under the direction of that bureau is estimated. The estimates have the approval of the Secretary of the Navy and a general board of naval officers convened for the purpose. If a reduction is to be made in one of the bureaus, the Bureau of Construction and Repair, or Engineering, or some other branch of the Navy, it is considered before the estimate is made.

As a general proposition, as the Senator from Georgia says, a bill coming in here may seem to be crude in a measure, yet it represents several weeks of study, not only in this body but in the other House before it reaches the Senate. We have before our committee the hearings in detail before the House committee, filling several volumes at the last session of Congress. There is the place where the estimates are considered upon which the appropriations are based, and if it is possible to reduce an appropriation, the reduction is made in the Bureau of Construction and Repair for a dry dock, for instance, or the Bureau of Steam Engineering, or in the Marine-Hospital Service, and it is not a horizontal reduction.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I certainly have no disposition to cast any reflection whatever upon the efficiency of our Appropriations Committee. I simply contend that there should be some organization which would include the chairmen of all these committees having charge of appropriation bills to sit in judgment upon the estimates, in the first instance, ascertaining what the revenue of the country is likely to be and then determining what amount should be assigned to each department, and then returning the estimates to the various departments with instructions to accommodate their estimates to the amount to be actually appropriated. I believe that that would accomplish more beneficial results than the present system.

Now, Mr. President, I will simply say in extension of my remarks that if there is any reduction in the tariff it may result in a deficit of revenue. If that is the case, we shall have to find revenue from some other source, and one of the questions which this Congress will have to take up will be what source that shall be. I have suggested in the resolution that there should be a graduated corporation tax, not imposed as a vexatious tax upon the small corporations now struggling for existence, but imposed upon those of larger revenue, and increasing with the size of such revenue.

I also think that the whole question of river regulation should be taken up and a great constructive measure passed which shall provide for the cooperation of the great scientific services of the Government in treating a river as a whole, from its source to its mouth, instead of permitting a river to be treated as now, by three or four detached services in detached sections, and that cooperation should be accomplished in some way between the Nation and the States, so that each sovereign would do the work within its jurisdiction under common plans devised and approved by all, and that a large fund should be provided for this purpose from the National Treasury of from $30,000,000 to $50,000,000 annually.

In order to provide for this work we should either save in our military expenditures or we should provide another tax, such as an increased corporation tax, for which an income tax can later on be substituted when the constitutional amendment is adopted.

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] desires an executive session, and I do not wish to detain the Senate longer. I shall to-morrow, at the close of the routine morning business, claim its attention with reference to a few questions which I have not discussed at this session.

I simply wish to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that we have a period of seven months between the present time and the regular session in December next; that it will be very easy for us, by a legislative declaration regarding a legislative program, to determine, first, the questions that we are to act upon at this session; second, the questions that our committees are to act upon with a view to a report at the regular session; and that we can devote at least four months or five months of those seven months beneficially to this work of cleaning up the legislation which ought to have been passed long before this.

We can easily take a recess during July and August, and that will give us five months of legislation, a sufficient time to dispose of all these important questions.

POWER OF THE PROGRESSIVES.

I wish to impress upon the progressives of this body that they have the power to organize this body from President pro tempore down, and that they have the power to lay down a legislative program that will cover every one of these existing abuses and will cover the retrenchment policy that the country is calling for.

Mr. HEYBURN. If the Senator will permit me, I should like to know how eight Members of this body can control the action of the body? What is the statement of the Senator based upon?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do not say that eight men can control its action.

Mr. HEYBURN. How many?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I say a majority of this body can control its action, and control its organization, and that as Democrats and progressive Republicans have a common aim——

Mr. HEYBURN. A common——

Mr. NEWLANDS. So far as the correction of existing abuses is concerned, it is their duty before the country to get together in some form and secure a legislative program during the next five months that will result in decisive action.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I want to know whether the Democrats are in such harmony with those who call themselves progressives as that they can agree upon legislation.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

Mr. HEYBURN. Then I want to know whether the progressives are in harmony with the Democrats or the Democrats are in harmony with the progressives. Those are important questions.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will say as far as the Democrats are concerned that almost everything that is urged in this resolution is covered by their platform. I assume that the Democrats are going to stand by their platform, and I assume that the Democratic Party is a progressive party.

Now, we know from the utterances of the progressive Republicans at this Congress and at previous Congresses and upon the stump and in publications what their views are upon these great questions, and I believe that they are in substantial harmony with us except upon the question of the tariff. The progressive Republicans believe in the protective principle whilst the Democrats do not, but as they both believe in a practical reduction of the excessive duties of the tariff they can certainly unite in action upon that subject.

Mr. HEYBURN. So the Senator thinks——

Mr. NEWLANDS. So I think the whole subject of progressive reform is before a body capable of dealing with it, a majority of whom are in sympathy with it, and only require time in order to crystallize it into the legislation of the country.

Mr. HEYBURN. If the Senator will permit me, I should like to know whether the Democrats are going to move toward those who call themselves progressive Republicans or are the progressive Republicans going to move into the Democratic camp in order to accomplish this object.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I am not much concerned about the form of accomplishment. All I want to do is to see the thing accomplished; and I assume that the men who are intent upon this reform——

Mr. HEYBURN. Would the Senator be willing to go into the progressive camp?

Mr. NEWLANDS (continuing). Are not so fastidious about the form of organization as to prevent them from voting for a good thing when they see it.

Mr. HEYBURN. Would the Senator from Nevada then feel that it might be that he would move into the progressive Republican camp?

Mr. NEWLANDS. No.

Mr. HEYBURN. So they would then move into the Democratic camp?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Not at all.

Mr. HEYBURN. How far are they from the Democratic camp now?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I believe they have hopes of carrying with them the entire Republican Party. I believe myself that a majority of the Republican Party of the country are with the progressive Republicans to-day. [Applause in the galleries.]

Mr. HEYBURN. With them in what way?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Occupants of the galleries will refrain from demonstrations, either of approval or disapproval.

Mr. HEYBURN. With them in what way? What does the Senator mean, may I ask him?

Mr. NEWLANDS. With them in their views regarding the correction of existing abuses.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is a broad question.

Mr. NEWLANDS. In reforms in legislation and reforms in administration I believe the majority of the Republican Party are with the progressive Republicans.

Mr. HEYBURN. How would the Senator——

Mr. NEWLANDS. I can not believe that there is more than a fourth of the people—I can not believe that there is even a fourth of the people—of the United States who stand for reaction.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator says again that he believes they are in favor of reform. Is it the kind of reform I mentioned a little while ago, that they would turn their backs upon the principles that they had professed and march the other way from them? Is that reform? I will leave that to be answered. I do not want it answered by——

Mr. NEWLANDS. I am not undertaking now to answer the refining definition made by the Senator from Idaho upon the subject of reform.

Mr. HEYBURN. It represents the difference between going east and going west.

Mr. NEWLANDS. All I say is that there is no reason why good men should not unite upon a good thing when it is presented for legislation, and that all the discussion about the form and the courtesies and etiquette of the method of their getting together is entirely irrelevant. For my part I do not propose to enter into that.

Now, Mr. President, I will ask to have inserted in the RECORD a letter from myself to Hon. CHAMP CLARK upon these questions so far as relates to the action of the Democratic Party at this session.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, we are falling into a bad habit here of printing as a part of our proceedings letters written by people in another branch, and speeches made. I object to printing the letter.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is a letter written by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] to a gentleman in the other branch, the Chair understands.

Mr. NEWLANDS. It was written by me.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator desires his letter-press copy to be made a part of the RECORD? I have no objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. No objection is heard to the printing of the letter in the RECORD, and it is so ordered.

The letter referred to is as follows:

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM OF THE FIRST SESSION OF THE SIXTY-SECOND CONGRESS—LETTER OF HON. FRANCIS G. NEWLANDS, OF NEVADA, TO HON. CHAMP CLARK.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, D. C., March 15, 1911.

Hon. CHAMP CLARK,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. CLARK: The extra session is now approaching; the House is Democratic, the Senate and the Executive Department are Republican. Under this condition of divided responsibility the question arises as to what policy the Democratic Party shall pursue. It has already been practically determined that the House will take up, in addition to the reciprocity treaty, the tariff; and the question is, whether it will take up other matters of reform and constructive legislation, and, with a view thereto, select the committees necessary to the consideration of such measures. The Senate will probably follow the lead of the House in this particular.

I hope, therefore, that it will not be regarded as intrusive if I, in common with other Democrats, venture a few suggestions on this score, as the question is of the highest importance to Democracy generally.

DEMOCRATIC DUTY.

It seems to me that it is incumbent upon the Democratic Party, because of its victory at the last election, to indicate decisively to the country, by specific bills to be passed through the House of Representatives, what it proposes to do if intrusted with complete power in 1912. The voters in the next campaign will rely more upon our performance than upon our promise, and we should therefore during the extra session and the next session crystallize into legislation, so far as we can, the pledges which we have made in our platform.

THE REFORM MEASURES.

The reform measures relate principally to the three branches of interstate commerce—interstate transportation, or the railroads; interstate trade, or the trusts; and interstate exchange, or banking.

With reference to interstate transportation the Democrats have supported all the various measures amendatory of the interstate commerce act which have been passed. So far as legislation is concerned the transportation question may be regarded as adjusted, for an administrative commission, which has the confidence of the public has been created, with full powers for that purpose, and it will stand as a quasi-judicial tribunal to do justice to the shippers and the public on one side and to the common carriers on the other.

All of our platform requirements on the transportation question have been complied with except those relating to a valuation of the physical properties and to the control of stock and bond issues of railroads engaged in interstate commerce. The Democratic Party should pass a bill embracing these subjects, and in order to accomplish this it will be necessary for the House to appoint its Committee on Commerce.

Outside of this there is some desirable legislation upon the subject of holding companies, which may well be passed in connection with the transportation question.

In order to combine numerous State railroads into a great interstate system it has become the custom of the railroads to organize holding companies under the laws of a single State, in whose legislation the other States comprised within the railroad system have no participation. It seems to me that in railroad corporate organization we should pursue, so far as practicable, the Federal system which prevails in government, and that if it is necessary to unionize State railroads for the purpose of creating an interstate system of transportation, it should be done through the organization of national holding companies created under a national law, in the making of which all the States interested can participate, instead of under a State law in the legislation of which only the people of a single State can participate. We will thus, whilst preserving our State railroads as corporate units, relying upon their respective States for their organization and powers, be able to federalize them under a Federal law for interstate purposes. The stock and bond issues of such holding companies, of course, should be subject to the control of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

INTERSTATE TRADE, OR THE TRUSTS.

The interstate commerce act for the regulation of railroads and the antitrust act for the prohibition of trusts were passed about the same time. The administration of the former was given to a quasi judicial board; the administration of the latter was given to the Attorney General's office. After about 23 years of operation, through a gradual process of evolution, the regulation of railroads engaged in interstate commerce has practically been accomplished and a system of cooperation is being brought about between the national commission and the various State commissions tending to insure harmony of action in the regulation of railroads by the States and the Nation, each within its jurisdiction; the former over purely State commerce, and the latter over interstate commerce.

The administration of the antitrust act, on the contrary, has been lame and halting, changing with the shifting incumbents of the Attorney General's office, and according to the requirements of political exigencies. As a result, practically no progress has been made in the control of the trusts; and whilst a few suits have been prosecuted to a successful result and others are now in process of prosecution, there exist to-day over 800 trust organizations of enormous capitalization practically without regulation or control. Experience should teach us that with reference to interstate trade a commission or board should be organized, similar to the Interstate Commerce Commission, with powers of investigation, of condemnation, and of recommendation, and with a view, whilst preserving the good arising from commercial combination, to curing the pernicious practices connected therewith. Such legislation should include among the powers of the commission the power, upon complaint or its own initiative, to inquire into the organization of all corporations engaged in interstate trade, and upon finding that any such organization is unlawful under the terms of the antitrust act, to call upon the Attorney General to prosecute the same.

The interstate trade commission should have a power similar to that of the Interstate Commerce Commission of appearing in litigation by its own counsel.

Such legislation should also include the additional remedies declared for in our last platform, namely, the prevention of the duplication of directors among competing corporations engaged in interstate commerce, a license system applicable to corporations engaged in interstate commerce and controlling a large percentage of the products in which they respectively deal, and prohibiting the control by such corporations of more than a certain percentage of the total amount of any product consumed in the United States; and also legislation compelling such licensed corporations to sell to all purchasers in all parts of the country on the same terms, after making allowance for the cost of transportation.

Such legislation will be necessary whatever may be the action of the Supreme Court upon the pending cases. If such combinations are held to be legal, the regulation of their prices and practices becomes a public necessity; if they are held to be illegal, then there should be some law which, while permitting large capitalization and the ownership of many plants by a single corporation engaged in interstate trade, will protect the public from the abuses attendant upon such large capitalization and the oppression exercised by it.

INTERSTATE EXCHANGE, OR BANKING.

Interstate exchange is as much a part of interstate commerce as interstate transportation, and any bank, whether national or State, which is engaged in interstate exchange is subject to national regulation.

Many large banks have forgotten their true function—that of exchange—and have been turned over to the aid of promotion and speculation. Sufficient reserves, particularly in the case of State banks, have not been required, nor has the proper relation between the capital of the banks and their obligations been established. Adequate provision has not been made for the mutual protection of the depositors in the banks and for mutual safeguards against bank runs and panics. Our platform calls for legislation upon this subject, and all the commercial banks of the country engaged in interstate exchange as well as State exchange are necessarily subject to the control of the national as well as the State sovereignties, each acting within its jurisdiction, the one over interstate exchange and the other over State exchange.

The repeated bank panics, with their attendant breaks in the exchange of commodities between sections, communities, and individuals, are as intolerable as would be the breaks in transportation of great interstate railway systems, caused by cutting out a section of track here or the destruction of a bridge there or by other obstacles impeding the movement of trains and of freight and passengers. There exists no greater necessity for these constant breaks in exchange than there does for similar breaks in transportation. The practice would be regarded as iniquitous which could, without the right of the Nation to intervene, impede the movement of crops by destruction of portions of the railway tracks or by piling up the railway cars of the country in New York and using them there for warehouses instead of for transportation. And yet this has been permitted with reference to the reserves of the country banks, whose cash deposits in New York have been tied up in promotion and speculation in such a way as to prevent their return to the various communities when needed for the movement of the crops.

The first thing, therefore, that it would be well to do is to secure the depositors and relieve them of apprehension, by compelling banks to maintain capital and reserves fairly proportioned to their obligations; and also by providing for a system of mutual protection, under which the reserves can be summoned to the point of danger and used for the relief of embarrassing situations. In this legislative work it would be well to federalize the system of banking, just as we have federalized the system of transportation, by organizing in each State a national reserve association, in which all the banks of such States, both national and State, engaged in interstate exchange, shall be the stockholders, and to which shall be transferred the note-issuing functions now enjoyed by the national banks, with powers of emergency circulation upon proper security. Such reserve associations should have powers of investigation of the banks constituting the membership, and there should be some method devised for the prompt payment of the depositors of any insolvent bank, a member of the association, by the taking over of its assets and the payment of its liabilities by the association. Such reserve associations should be federalized through an annual convention at Washington of the presidents thereof, with power to select eight members of a national banking commission, to be authorized by law, one from each judicial circuit, who, together with seven others, consisting of the Secretary of the Treasury, the Postmaster General, the Attorney General, the Comptroller of the Currency, and three others to be appointed by the President, would constitute a national banking commission, advisory in character both to the President and to Congress, and with powers of investigation and of recommendation as to legislation. Through the action of such a banking commission the evolution of bank regulation would be accomplished in the same gradual and effective manner as has been accomplished in the case of the Interstate Commerce Commission regarding railways.

Thus we would unite the national and State banks within the borders of each State in a purely State association for mutual protection and efficiency, and would then federalize the State associations through the organization of a national council or commission at Washington. Such a Federal system, patterned after our National Government, would, without interfering with the powers of the State over purely State commerce or State exchange, give to the National Government full regulation and control of interstate exchange.

A BUDGET COMMITTEE.

In this connection it would be well to establish a budget committee, of which at least one-half should be composed of the chairmen of the various appropriation committees of the House. Such organization should have in view cooperation with the Committee on Public Expenditures by the Senate and with the commission of economy established by the executive department, with a view to adapting governmental expenses to the national income and apportioning such income to the various services and departments in such a way as to secure the most efficient and economical administration at the least expense.

THE MILITARY AND NAVAL EXPENSE.

It might be well to declare by law that the expense of the Military and Naval Establishments should be cut down to $100,000,000 annually each, and in this connection a comparatively free hand should be given to the military and naval boards, respectively, to postpone or eliminate expenditures already authorized by law, thus applying the best energies of these boards to economical and efficient administration.

In connection with our Naval Establishment we can maintain our platform assurances as to a merchant marine and an adequate Navy by providing that the present Navy should be made proportionate and self-sustaining by the construction of an auxiliary Navy to be used in aid of the fighting ships in time of war and in establishing new routes of commerce through lease to shipping companies in times of peace, with such accompanying organization of our training schools and Naval Reserves as will man the auxiliary ships for purposes of commerce in time of peace and train them for use in time of war.

Such legislation should involve the temporary diminution of the construction of fighting ships and the substitution of auxiliary ships, and should be accompanied also by free entry to American registry of all ships, wherever constructed.

CONSERVATION OF WATERWAYS.

It would be well for us to carry out the pledges of our platform regarding the conservation of our natural resources and internal development, as well as the specific instructions of our platform for the "immediate adoption of a liberal and comprehensive plan for improving every water course in the Union which is justified by the needs of commerce, and to secure, where practicable, the connection of the Great Lakes with the navigable rivers and with the Gulf through the Mississippi River and the navigable rivers with each other by artificial canals, with the view of perfecting a system of inland waterways to be navigated by vessels of standard draft"; and also securing the coordination of the various services of the Government connected with waterways in one service for the purpose of aiding in the completion of such a system of inland waterways and the creation of a fund ample for continuous work, which shall be conducted under the direction of a commission of experts, to be authorized by law."

THE PHILIPPINES.

It would also be well to take measures to carry out our platform regarding the Philippines by declaring the Nation's purpose to recognize their independence as soon as a stable government can be established and by taking measures to secure a neutralization of the islands by treaty with other powers, and by throwing open the trade of the Philippines to all countries, without preference to ourselves, just as we are demanding that the "open door" shall be maintained as to Manchuria. In doing this we should have regard for our obligations to humanity by actual appropriation for the industrial and agricultural training of the Filipino people, without resorting to the concealments hitherto employed through favored entrance of Philippine products to the American markets to the injury of our customs duties.

COMMITTEE ORGANIZATION.

In order to consider the reform and constructive measures above referred to, as well as other matters contained in our platform, such as publicity of campaign contributions, the extension of agricultural, mechanical, and industrial education, etc., it will be necessary to organize the committees of the House applicable to such subjects. This does not necessarily imply that during the extra session we should take up general legislation outside of the reciprocity treaty and the tariff, but it does give the Democratic Party the opportunity pari pasu with the work of the Ways and Means Committee of the House, and whilst the measures passed by the House are pending in the Senate for the long and deliberate consideration always attendant upon legislation there, to thoroughly investigate the questions referred to and to frame the legislation which can be urged later on at the regular session. We will thus enter upon the regular session in December next with our measures fully shaped for immediate consideration, and will be enabled to bring the regular session to a close in time for a full consideration of Democratic policies at the national convention and in the campaign following.

With your permission I will send this letter to the Democratic Members of the House and Senate, in the hope that it may bring out other suggestions on these lines.

In view of the decided trend toward Democratic success, it is of more importance that we should debate among ourselves these serious questions than that we should debate them with our antagonists, and it seems to me of great importance that some method of conference should be established between the Democrats of the House and the Senate regarding them.

Very sincerely, yours, FRANCIS G. NEWLANDS.

Mr. NEWLANDS. To-morrow at the close of the morning business, if an opportunity offers, I will continue this discussion upon matters which I have not yet touched.

ELECTION OF SENATORS BY DIRECT VOTE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 39) proposing an amendment to the Constitution providing that Senators shall be elected by the people of the several States.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I understand the Senator from Illinois desires to move an executive session. I wish to say just a word before the motion is made in regard to the matter which is now before the Senate—that is, House joint resolution 39. I very much desire to have a day fixed for a vote upon the joint resolution and the amendment, and not so much for the convenience of the Senator who has the measure in charge as for the convenience of Senators who are compelled to be away to some extent from time to time. I have had a number of requests from Senators on both sides of the Chamber that a day be fixed far in advance, so that there can be no doubt about all having an opportunity to be here without inconvenience. In view of that, I am going to ask that June 1 be fixed.

I ask unanimous consent to the effect that we take up this joint resolution June 1, together with all amendments which may be submitted, and vote upon the amendments and the joint resolution during that legislative day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho requests unanimous consent that upon the——

Mr. HEYBURN. I object, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made. The Chair will not finish the statement.

Mr. CULLOM. If the Senator is through——

Mr. BORAH. Just a moment. Of course, objection is made and it is not debatable, but I desire to say just a word. Unless a time is agreed upon we will be compelled to consider the joint resolution more at length than we have been doing, and I hope that those who are moving to-day for an adjournment will move only for an adjournment until to-morrow. Is that the purpose?

Mr. CULLOM. It is my purpose, as far as I am concerned, to have a session to-morrow.

Mr. BORAH. That is right.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 10 minutes spent in executive session, the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, May 16, 1911, at 2 o'clock p. m.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, May 16, 1911.

The Senate met at 2 o'clock p. m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Ulysses G. B. Pierce, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented a concurrent resolution adopted by the Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii, which was referred to the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Concurrent resolution.

Whereas the citizens of Hawaii, previous to annexation of the islands by the United States, had established and maintained for more than 50 years an independent national government, and thereby demonstrated their capacity for self-government under and equal to the responsibilities of a sovereign State; and

Whereas annexation by one of the great powers of the world was inevitable, owing to the mere numerical weakness of such a small State and its inability to support armed defense on land and sea; and

Whereas immediately following the annexation of Hawaii by the United States Congress passed an organic law giving Hawaii the status of a Territory that has been the traditional stepping-stone to statehood; and

Whereas under this form the citizens of Hawaii have conducted their government in a conservative, patriotic, and able manner, providing liberally in all manner for the development of the highest standards of American citizenship among all classes of the cosmopolitan population; and

Whereas Hawaii, the State, is as certainly the natural and ultimate destiny of these islands as was the annexation by and admission as an integral part of the United States of America; and

Whereas the record of our people of the present day, the evidences of their thrift in the figures of per capita, the proofs of their intelligence and ambition as shown by the small percentage of illiteracy among them, is such as to command for them a respect and confidence equaling that accorded the citizens of any State in the Union: Therefore be it

Resolved by the house of representatives, session of 1911 (the senate concurring), That the Congress of the United States is hereby requested and respectfully petitioned to pass an enabling act authorizing the citizens of the Territory of Hawaii to, and naming the date when they shall, elect delegates to a constitutional convention for the purpose of framing a constitution for the government of the State of Hawaii, the same to be in full force and effect when approved by Congress and the President in the manner and form usual to the admission of States; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to the President of the United States, the President of the United States Senate, and the Speaker of the House of Representatives at Washington, and to the Hon. Jonah K. Kalanianaole.

THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
OF THE TERRITORY OF HAWAII,
Honolulu, Hawaii, April 25, 1911.

We hereby certify that the foregoing concurrent resolution was adopted in the house of representatives of the Territory of Hawaii on the 25th day of April, A. D. 1911.

H. L. HOLSTEIN,
Speaker House of Representatives.
EDWARD WOODWARD,
Clerk House of Representatives.

THE SENATE OF THE TERRITORY OF HAWAII,
Honolulu, Hawaii, April 25, 1911.

We hereby certify that the foregoing concurrent resolution was adopted in the senate of the Territory of Hawaii on the 25th day of April, A. D. 1911.

ERIC A. KNUDSEN,
President of the Senate.
JOHN H. WISE,
Clerk of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented a concurrent resolution adopted by the Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii, which was referred to the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Concurrent resolution.

Whereas the welfare and civic progress of Hawaii depend upon building up in this Territory a larger citizen population; and

Whereas such a population, by providing a stronger local militia and by supporting diversified agriculture and the production within the Territory of foods now imported, will increase the value of Hawaii to the military defense of the United States; and

Whereas assisted immigration has already created in this Territory a population of Caucasian farmers and farm laborers numbering nearly 30,000: Therefore be it

Resolved by the senate of the Legislature of Hawaii (the house of representatives concurring), That Congress is requested to amend the organic act so as to provide substantially as follows:

That the Territory of Hawaii shall have authority to employ funds raised by taxation to prepay the fares and otherwise to encourage the immigration to Hawaii of Caucasians, whether from the mainland of the United States or from other countries: Provided, That such immigrants, except in respect to being assisted, shall be eligible to admission to the United States under such Federal immigration laws as may at the time of their arrival be in force: And provided further, That the Territory of Hawaii shall be bound to return to the country from which they came any such immigrants who may, within three years after their landing in the United States, become public charges.

And in order to protect the Territory of Hawaii in securing the benefit of such expenditures, any labor agent or other person who shall solicit to leave the Territory immigrants thus assisted with Territorial funds to come to Hawaii shall provide bonds satisfactory to the treasurer of Hawaii that he will pay the expense of returning to the country from which they came all immigrants thus solicited and removing from the Territory to the mainland of the United States who may, within three years after landing in the United States, become public charges; and shall, in addition, reimburse the Territorial government for the cost of bringing to Hawaii any immigrants who may, in consequence of this solicitation, remove from the Territory, and the Legislature of said Territory is hereby authorized to make suitable laws for carrying out these provisions; and be it

Resolved, That a certified copy of this resolution be sent to the President and Vice President of the United States, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, the Delegate to Congress from Hawaii, and the Governor of Hawaii.

THE SENATE OF THE TERRITORY OF HAWAII,
Honolulu, Hawaii, April 19, 1911.

We hereby certify that the foregoing concurrent resolution was this day adopted in the senate of the Territory of Hawaii.

ERIC A. KNUDSEN,
President of the Senate.
JOHN H. WISE,
Clerk of the Senate.

THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
OF THE TERRITORY OF HAWAII,
Honolulu, Hawaii, April 22, 1911.

We hereby certify that the foregoing concurrent resolution was this day adopted in the house of representatives of the Territory of Hawaii.

H. L. HOLSTEIN,
Speaker House of Representatives.
EDWARD WOODWARD,
Clerk House of Representatives.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented a concurrent resolution adopted by the Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii, which was referred to the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Concurrent resolution.

Whereas from an early period in the history of the United States it has been a settled policy in those States and Territories owning public lands to set aside large areas solely for educational purposes; and

Whereas no provision was made, at the time this Territory became a part of the United States, to prevent the alienation of valuable revenue-producing lands from the people to private individuals and corporations, in order that the development of land and water of the Territory of Hawaii might be conserved in the interests of the education and the promotion of homesteading; and

Whereas it is desirable and fitting that adequate and permanent provision be made for the support and maintenance of education and the promotion of homesteading throughout the Territory of Hawaii, which provisions may best be made by setting apart for such uses the rents, issues, and profits of the developed public lands and waters requiring action of the Congress of the United States of America; and

Whereas it appears from the records of the land department of the Territory of Hawaii that in the neighborhood of 40,000 acres of developed agricultural lands, with water appurtenant thereto or capable of being led thereon, are under lease (principally to large corporations) in many instances at a very low rental; and

Whereas it is estimated that such developed lands and developed waters would, if handled in accordance with good business principles, return an income to the Territory of Hawaii about $400,000 a year; and

Whereas with a property-tax rate of 1 per cent on the actual cash value, the Territory finds itself without the funds necessary to carry on its educational measures and the proper aid to homesteaders throughout the Territory; and

Whereas heretofore the Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii did petition the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, to amend "An act to provide a government for the Territory of Hawaii," approved April 30, 1900; and

Whereas said petition contained in detail the proposed amendments to said act; and

Whereas the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, by act approved May 27, 1910, amended said "act to provide a government for the Territory of Hawaii" as petitioned by the said Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii, excepting as to homesteading, the plan of which as submitted by the said legislature in its petition to Congress was so altered, changed, and amended that the same became, and is, entirely unfit to afford the greatest, or, in fact, any appreciable benefit to the Territory of Hawaii and its inhabitants; and

Whereas the present law, in so far as it relates to developed lands and developed waters which now produce an annual income of about $150,000, but which under systematic control should, upon the expiration of the present leases and licenses, yield an annual income of about $400,000, will, unless amended so as to make said lands and waters capable of reasonable exploitation, result not only in an annual loss of $250,000, but may, through being allotted to speculative homesteaders at a small fraction of its real value, be entirely lost to the Territory: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii, That the Congress of the United States of America be, and it hereby is, respectfully requested to make such provision by the passage of an act substantially in the words and figures following:

An act to provide for the support and maintenance of the public schools and the promotion of homesteading.

Be it enacted, etc.:

SECTION 1. That from and after the passage of this act all the developed public land and all developed water of the Territory of Hawaii, excepting those lands that have already been applied for under the provisions of section 73 of the organic act, as amended by Congress, and have since been surveyed, plotted, and mapped, less such portion thereof as may have been set aside for specific purposes, together with all rights, easements, privileges, appurtenances, rents, issues, and profits thereof, shall be held and administered by a commission, of which the governor of the Territory of Hawaii and the land commissioner, or other person holding a position corresponding thereto, shall be ex-officio members, the remaining three members, who shall not be pecuniarily interested in any sugar plantation in the Territory of Hawaii, to be appointed by the governor, by and with the approval of the senate of the Territory of Hawaii; the first three members to be appointed to said commission shall hold offices respectively for the terms of four, six, and eight years; all appointments thereafter shall be for the full term of eight years. Said appointees shall be removable by the governor with the consent of the Senate. Said members, other than the ex-officio members of said commission, shall receive as compensation for their services such sum as the Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii shall from time to time appropriate for that purpose.

SEC. 2. Said commission, so appointed as aforesaid, is hereby authorized to hold, manage, lease, license, rent, or otherwise utilize said lands and waters, except by sale of same or any part thereof or any interest therein as said commission may deem best, to the end that as large a revenue as possible may be derived therefrom, and in order to more effectually accomplish this purpose, the restrictions imposed by law upon the management, handling, and dealing in and with public land and water in the Territory of Hawaii, shall not be held or considered to apply as to said developed land and developed water in any respect other than as specifically set forth in this act: And provided, That at any time upon two years' notice having been previously given after the first five years of any lease, the legislature may, upon the request of the governor of the Territory of Hawaii, remove any of said lands from the operation of this act for the purpose of making the same available at a value not less than the market value of same to be placed thereon by three appraisers appointed by said legislature under the law relating to homesteading: Provided, however, That no lease or license shall be granted by said commission for a period of more than 21 years, and that all leases and licenses made by said commission shall contain a clause giving them—the said commissioners—the right to readjust the rentals thereunder at the end of each seven-year period of said lease or license. Said readjustment, in the event the lessee or licensee and said commissioners are unable to agree as to the rental value for the next period, shall be subject to review by the supreme court of the Territory of Hawaii, the decision of which said court shall be final. Every lease or license shall contain a condition with a covenant by the lessee that he or it will make such reasonable contracts for buying cane from the homesteaders and neighboring farmers as shall have been approved by the commission.

SEC. 3. The revenues derived from such land and water shall be paid by the said commission to the treasurer of the Territory of Hawaii, who shall deposit the same in a special fund. Such fund shall from time to time be appropriated by the Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii solely for the purpose of improving and extending the educational system of said Territory of Hawaii, or for use for the promotion of homesteading in the following proportions, to wit: Fifty per cent of such revenue to be for the use and benefit of the public schools, 40 per cent thereof for the promotion of homesteading, and 10 per cent thereof for the use and benefit of the College of Hawaii.

SEC. 4. Said commission shall, within 30 days after its appointment, make and publish rules and regulations affecting its powers, and from time to time alter and amend the same, which rules and regulations shall, upon the application of a majority of said commission, be reviewable by the supreme court of the Territory of Hawaii, and the judgment of said supreme court as to the effect and reasonableness of said rules and regulations shall be final.

SEC. 5. The term "developed land," as used herein, shall mean public lands which have heretofore been used or are now being used for agricultural purposes.

The term "developed water," as used herein, shall mean water which has heretofore been used or is now being used for agricultural purposes and purposes incidental to the development of lands and the growing and transportation of crops and the cultivation of the soil.

SEC. 6. This act shall take effect upon its approval.

THE SENATE OF THE TERRITORY OF HAWAII,
Honolulu, Hawaii, April 26, 1911.

We hereby certify that the foregoing concurrent resolution was this day adopted in the senate of the Territory of Hawaii.

ERIC A. KNUDSEN,
President of the Senate.
JOHN H. WISE,
Clerk of the Senate.

THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
OF THE TERRITORY OF HAWAII,
Honolulu, Hawaii, April 26, 1911.

We hereby certify that the foregoing concurrent resolution was this day adopted in the house of representatives of the Territory of Hawaii.

H. L. HOLSTEIN,
Speaker House of Representatives.
EDWARD WOODWARD,
Clerk House of Representatives.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented a concurrent resolution adopted by the Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii, which was referred to the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Concurrent resolution requesting Congress to enact and the President to approve an act authorizing the construction of a ditch from Hilo to Kau, island and Territory of Hawaii, and for other purposes incidental thereto.

Whereas there are large areas of fertile land in the district of Kau, island and Territory of Hawaii, both of public and private ownership, which are nonproductive or productive only to a limited degree by reason of the lack of rainfall or water for irrigation; and

Whereas there are many streams in the district of Hilo, on said island, much of the water of which is at times running to waste; and

Whereas it will be in the public interest to have such waste water conveyed to said arid and semiarid lands for the purpose of developing the same and bringing them under cultivation; and

Whereas the cost of constructing the ditches, reservoirs, and other structures necessary or incidental to the transportation of said waters as aforesaid and of maintaining and operating the same will be large, rendering it necessary for parties undertaking such work to raise money to operate by means of the issuance of bonds; and

Whereas it is improbable that private capital, without the guaranties hereinafter contemplated and provided for, would undertake to finance the said enterprise; and

Whereas, in the opinion of this legislature, the public interests will be advanced by the successful development of said lands in the district of Kau by means of said waters to the extent of warranting public assistance in that behalf in manner herein set forth; and

Whereas the sanction and approval of Congress is necessary in order to secure to the grantee hereunder the rights, powers, privileges, and authority herein enumerated: Now therefore be it

Resolved, That the Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii doth hereby recommend to and petition the Congress of the United States to pass, and the President to approve, an act of Congress in substantially the following form, viz:

SECTION 1. The right and power is hereby granted to John T. McCrosson and to his associates and assigns, and to such corporation as may be organized by him or them for the purpose of taking over and exercising the rights, powers, and privileges hereby conferred, hereinafter collectively referred to as the Ditch Co., to construct a ditch, together with the tunnels, dams, water heads, reservoirs, roads, trails, conduits, buildings, machinery, and other structures or appliances necessary or proper for conducting or storing water to flow through said ditch from any point in the district of Hilo (which term shall be held to include both North and South Hilo), island and Territory of Hawaii, through the said district to and through the districts of Puna and Kau, in said island and Territory, and to any point or points therein: Provided, That said ditch shall be constructed at an elevation of not less than 2,500 feet at its nearest point to the land of Hakalau, district of Hilo, and shall have a fall of not more than 6 feet to the mile within the limits of said district of Hilo.

SEC. 2. The right and power is also granted to the Ditch Co. to develop, produce, use, sell, and transmit power produced by water within the district of Kau, but not elsewhere.

SEC. 3. And also the right and power to buy, take on lease, or otherwise acquire by private purchase, and to hold all land or interests in land necessary, convenient, or proper for the purposes aforesaid, or any of them.

SEC. 4. And also the right and power to condemn and take any land, or interest in land, necessary or proper for rights of way or for dam or reservoir or building sites for the purposes aforesaid, or any of them, subject, however, in all respects, as near as may be, to the obligations, restrictions, payments, and procedure now or hereafter imposed or prescribed by the laws of the Territory of Hawaii for the exercise of the right of eminent domain by public railroads in the Territory: And provided, however, That nothing in this act contained shall authorize or empower the condemnation of water or water rights nor permit the Ditch Co. to take or divert water now used in the said district of Hilo.

SEC. 5. The commissioner of public lands for the Territory of Hawaii, hereinafter referred to as the "commissioner," is hereby authorized and directed to execute to the Ditch Co., and the governor of the Territory of Hawaii, hereinafter referred to as the "governor," is authorized and directed to approve a lease of all such public lands in the district of Kau, to be designated by the Ditch Co., as are capable of being economically irrigated from the ditches of the company, together with rights of way for ditch purposes over all Government lands situated in said districts of Hilo, Puna, and Kau. The lease shall provide that if within six months from the date of the first delivery of water in the said district of Kau by the Ditch Co. it is ascertained to the satisfaction of the Ditch Co. that any of the lands theretofore designated by it are incapable of being economically watered from its waterways, such lands, or any portion thereof, shall be surrendered by the said Ditch Co. by notice in writing to the commissioner, and no rent for said lands so surrendered, if any, shall be charged or collected by the lessor, and that the surrender of a portion of such lands, as herein provided, shall in nowise affect the lessee's tenancy of the remaining lands under said lease; that the term of said lease shall be 50 years from the date hereinafter set forth; that the Ditch Co. shall have the right and authority at all times after the execution of said lease to enter upon all such public lands in the district of Kau for the purpose of surveys, construction work, etc.; that the rent to be paid for said lands shall be at the rate of $1 per acre per annum, payable to the Territory, at its option, either in water from the waterways of the Ditch Co. at the lowest rate payable by any consumer of water furnished by the company or in cash; that the Ditch Co. shall furnish to homesteaders or settlers along the line of the company's waterways, or such other person or persons along said waterways as the commissioner, with the approval of the governor, may direct, at a point or points to be designated by such officials, such water due as rental for said public lands. The Ditch Co. shall have full right to sublet the said lands or any part thereof, or to assign the lease in whole or in part, either by way of security or otherwise, subject, however, in all things to the provisions hereof. The lease shall be made subject to any unexpired and outstanding lease of any or all of such lands and shall contain appropriate provisions to secure the construction and maintenance of the necessary works for supplying such lands with water, and the reversion of such works to the Territory upon the termination of the lease, as hereinafter provided: Provided, however, That nothing herein shall authorize the withdrawal of any lands now open or applied for for settlement purposes.

SEC. 6. Not more than 30 per cent of the lands so held under lease by the Ditch Co. may at any time after the expiration of six months from the date of the first delivery of water as aforesaid by the Ditch Co. be withdrawn for public purposes or homesteaded or sold for other purposes under the laws relating to public lands in Hawaii, such withdrawal of lands to be, as far as practicable, in blocks of not less than 500 acres, and the right of way of the Ditch Co. through such land so withdrawn to be reserved to it, in which case the rent reserved shall be proportionately reduced at the rate of $1 per acre for the land so withdrawn, homesteaded, and sold: Provided, That written notice of intention to withdraw any portion of such public lands, together with a proper description of the lands so to be withdrawn, shall be served upon the Ditch Co. by the commissioner, with the approval of the governor, not less than three calendar months before such withdrawal is to take effect: Provided also, That growing crops, if any, upon said lands so to be withdrawn may be harvested by the Ditch Co. or those holding under it before such withdrawal is or shall be operative.

SEC. 7. The lease shall go into effect when the Ditch Co. shall have constructed a ditch from said district of Hilo to Pahala, in said Kau, with a delivering capacity of 100,000,000 gallons of water per day of 24 hours and when 50,000,000 gallons of water shall have been actually delivered by means of said waterway to said Pahala within a period of 24 consecutive hours, such date to be ascertained by the commissioner and fixed by him with the approval of the governor. Notice of the fixing of such date and the consequent beginning of the term of the lease shall be communicated in writing to the Ditch Co. by said officials within 10 days from the date thereof.

SEC. 8. A sum not less than $50,000 in cash shall be actually expended by the Ditch Co. in preliminary surveys, construction work upon said ditch or reservoirs, or for other good and useful purposes in that behalf within one year, $100,000 within two years, and $1,000,000 within three years from the date of the approval of this act by the President.

SEC. 9. The ditch shall be completed as far as said Pahala within four years, and as far as Waiohinu, in said Kau, within five years from the date of said approval.

SEC. 10. If the Ditch Co. shall fail to expend such respective sums of money, or any of them, within the respective times aforesaid, for the purposes aforesaid, then, and in any such case, all of the rights, powers, and privileges hereby granted, and the said lease, shall be forfeited and be null and void and of no effect, and all works and improvements up to that time erected or constructed shall immediately revert to and become the property of the Territory.

SEC. 11. If after such expenditures shall have been made the Ditch Co. shall fail to observe or perform any of the terms, requirements, or conditions herein contained or prescribed the governor shall give the Ditch Co. written notice to furnish to him within three months from the date of such notice assurances and proofs satisfactory to him that such breach or failure will be remedied and all terms, requirements, and conditions herein contained or prescribed observed, performed, or complied with within one year after the date of such notice. If the Ditch Co. shall fail to furnish to the governor assurances and proofs as aforesaid within such term of three months, or if, having furnished the same, there shall at the end of said term of one year remain unperformed, unfulfilled, or unobserved any term, requirement, or condition herein contained on the part of the Ditch Co. to be observed, kept, or performed, then and in such case all of the franchises hereby granted and the said lease shall be forfeited and be null and void and of no effect.

SEC. 12. That the times herein fixed for completion of the said ditch to various points, for the expenditure of moneys in surveys, construction, and other work aforesaid, and for the doing of any other or different act required by the Ditch Co., may for good cause shown be extended by order of the governor for a time which he shall deem reasonable in view of such cause.

SEC. 13. The corporation formed by the said J. T. McCrosson as aforesaid, for the purposes aforesaid, and its property used for or in carrying into effect the purposes aforesaid, or any of them, and its income shall be free from Territorial, municipal, and county property and income taxes for the term of 10 years after the approval of this act.

SEC. 14. The rates at which water flowing along said ditch and power produced thereby or incidental thereto shall be sold to applicants shall be fixed and published from time to time by the Ditch Co., with the approval of the governor, and such rates shall be the same to all.

SEC. 15. Such rates shall be based upon the yielding of not more than sufficient revenues to pay the following, viz:

(1) The reasonable expenses of maintenance and operation of the ditch and other plant and appurtenances.

(2) Interest on any bonds issued to procure money with which to construct the ditch and other plant and appurtenances at a rate not to exceed 6 per cent per annum, payable semiannually.

(3) An annual sinking fund to redeem all of such bonds within the term of the lease and franchises hereby granted.

(4) Dividends on the capital-stock issue of the Ditch Co. at a rate not to exceed 8 per cent upon the actual cost of the ditch and other plant and appurtenances.

SEC. 16. If at any time the income of the Ditch Co. shall exceed a sum sufficient for the purposes aforesaid the rates for water and such power shall be reduced to an estimated figure, approved by the governor, which will produce an income in compliance with the provisions of the section last aforesaid.

SEC. 17. The Ditch Co. shall at the end of each fiscal year ending June 30 file with the governor a report showing what its transactions have been during the previous year; what additions to the plant, if any, have been made; the actual cost thereof; its receipts and whence derived; and expenditures and for what made during the previous year. Such reports shall be open to public inspection. The books, papers, accounts, and records of said Ditch Co. shall at all times be subject to the inspection of the governor or the commissioner and to any agent or representative of said officers or either of them.

SEC. 18. At the end, or sooner determination, of the lease and franchises herein provided for the ditch and other plant and appurtenances shall revert to and become the property of the Territory of Hawaii, without payment therefor and free of all charges, expenses, liens, or obligations whatsoever.

SEC. 19. The Territory of Hawaii may at any time after 10 years from the completion of the ditch purchase from the Ditch Co. the ditch, together with all property and rights of whatsoever nature appertaining thereto, or used in connection therewith, for a sum equal to the cost thereof plus 20 per cent of such cost. The amount to be paid to the Ditch Co. for such purchase shall be determined by a commission of three persons, one to be appointed by the Ditch Co., or in case it should fail to do so within 30 days after requested to do so by the governor, then by the chief justice of the supreme court of Hawaii; one by the purchaser; and the third by the two so appointed, or in case they should fail to agree upon the third member within 30 days, then by said chief justice

Either the Ditch Co. or the Territory may appeal to the supreme court of Hawaii from the decision of such commission by filing a written notice of appeal with the commission within five days after the decision is rendered. It shall thereupon be the duty of the commission immediately to certify up to the supreme court the record of its proceedings, showing in such certificate the valuation claimed by the association, the valuation claimed by the purchaser, and the valuation as determined by the commission. Such certificates shall be accompanied by copies of all papers, documents, and evidence upon which the decision of the commission was based and a copy of such decision. Upon any such appeal the supreme court may, in its behalf, take or require further evidence to be introduced by either party.

Within six months after the determination of the purchase price as aforesaid the same shall be paid to the Ditch Co.

THE SENATE OF THE TERRITORY OF HAWAII,
Honolulu, Hawaii, April 7, 1911.

We hereby certify that the foregoing concurrent resolution was this day adopted in the senate of the Territory of Hawaii.

ERIC A. KNUDSEN,

Mr. DIXON. I present a resolution adopted by the Meagher County (Mont.) Wool Growers' Association regarding both tariff and reciprocity. The resolution is very short; it is not in the usual stereotyped form, and I think in the time—about three-quarters of a minute—it would take to read it the Senate might get some real information. I should like to have it read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read the resolution.

There being no objection, the resolution was read and referred to the Committee on Finance, as follows:

Be it resolved by the Meagher County Wool Growers' Association, held in convention at White Sulphur Springs, Mont., this 22d day of April, 1911, That we are opposed to any reduction in the present wool tariff or any legislation leading toward a reduction in the present duty on wool at this special session of Congress.

That the present cost of production be fully investigated, and that we have an opportunity to present to the Tariff Commission our facts and figures relative to the cost of producing our wool and mutton.

That we ask and demand the same protection on wool and mutton as other industries have on their products, and ask further that we be acceded sufficient duty to cover the difference in our cost of production and the cost of producing the same in other countries which are in position to export to this country.

We cordially invite any authorized agent of the Tariff Commission to meet with us relative to the cost of production, and will give them all facts regarding same, and further take them to our ranches and show them our method of handling our sheep and wools.

We feel that if we are given an opportunity of presenting our side of the situation that not only would there be no reduction in the duty on wools, but they would feel that an increase in the same would be our just deserts.

We solicit no pardon in demanding for our employees or ourselves that same protection which is accorded other industries whose hours of labor are 8 and 10, while ours range from 10 to 16 hours, sometimes all night and on Sundays.

We are willing to admit that the consumer is now paying 99 cents duty on a suit of clothes made of wools imported into this country, this on a strictly all-wool suit, which retails at from $40 to $50. This applies to the present duty, and is supposed to afford us a protection of 11 cents per pound in the grease, which we do not realize for some cause or other.

We are in favor of remodeling Schedule K so that we will be able to realize this protection in fact instead of in theory.

We are in favor of legislation regulating the manufacture and sale of all woolen products, and ask that all such products be inspected and labeled by a Government inspector so that woolen goods sold as wool are wool and not shoddy, cotton, or rags, and feel that we should be accorded the same protection in the manufacture and sale of woolen goods as is accorded other industries which are regulated by the pure-food law.

We are opposed to reciprocity as is set forth in the present bill before Congress.

C. W. COOK, President.
JAMES L. JOHNSTON, Secretary.

Mr. TOWNSEND presented the petition of G. L. de Muralt, of Ann Arbor, Mich., praying that an appropriation of $3,732.52 be made to reimburse him for loss in the installation of machinery in the Government power house at the navy yard, Charleston, S. C., which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. McLEAN presented the memorial of sundry citizens of Unionville, Conn., remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed treaty of arbitration between the United States and Great Britain, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of the Connecticut Merchants' Association, praying for the passage of the so-called parcels-post bill, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. BROWN presented sundry affidavits in support of the bill (S. 52) granting an increase of pension to John Brown, which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

MOBILE (ALA.) BICENTENNIAL.

Mr. ROOT. From the Committee on Industrial Expositions I report back favorably, without amendment, House concurrent resolution 8 in regard to the bicentennial celebration at Mobile May 26, 1911. I call the attention of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. JOHNSTON] to the resolution.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I ask for the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the concurrent resolution for the information of the Senate.

The concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 8) was read, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the resolution passed by the Legislature of Alabama in regard to the bicentennial celebration at Mobile on May 26, 1911, be received. The said resolution reads as follows:

"Senate joint resolution 52.

"[No. 241.]

"Whereas this year, 1911, is the two hundredth anniversary of the foundation and settlement of the city of Mobile, first capital of La Province de la Louisiane in 1711; and

"Whereas the city of Mobile and her people are making preparation for celebrating the event: Therefore be it

"Resolved by the Senate of Alabama (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Legislature of Alabama does hereby request the Senators and Representatives in Congress from the State of Alabama to bring the said anniversary celebration to the attention of Congress and the several departments of the United States Government and the representatives at Washington of foreign powers.

"Approved, April 6, 1911."

Be it further resolved, That the Congress of the United States acknowledges with pleasure the receipt of said resolution and appreciates the courtesy of the notice extended of that important event in the Nation's history.

Resolved further, That we commend the action of the city of Mobile in making preparations for this celebration. We regard that territory as one of the most valuable acquisitions of the Government and congratulate Alabama and the people of Mobile upon her growth as a city, and extend our best wishes for a successful celebration and a large attendance of patriotic American citizens.

Resolved further, That a copy of these resolutions be forwarded to the mayor of the city of Mobile in evidence of our appreciation of the work that will be done on May 26, 1911, in commemoration of the founding and settlement of our beautiful and progressive city on the Gulf.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the concurrent resolution? The Chair hears none.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. Mr. President, I wish to state that Mobile enjoys the distinction of having lived under three flags besides the American. It was the capital of the Province of Louisiana in 1711. It is one of the most beautiful and progressive cities in the United States, and I am sure its citizens will be glad to have every Member of the Senate and of Congress attend the celebration, and will give them a most hearty and cordial welcome.

The concurrent resolution was unanimously agreed to.

BARRACKS IN HAWAIIAN ISLANDS.

Mr. WARREN. From the Committee on Appropriations I report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 2183) to authorize change in construction of barracks and other necessary buildings for mobile troops in the Hawaiian Islands, and for other purposes, and I submit a report (No. 23) thereon. It is a short bill and the matter is rather important. I ask for its present consideration.

The Secretary read the bill, and, there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It authorizes the Secretary of War to expend the funds heretofore appropriated and to enter into contracts heretofore authorized for the construction of a cavalry post, Territory of Hawaii, by the acts of Congress approved March 4, 1909, and June 25, 1910, for the construction of barracks and other necessary buildings for mobile troops to be stationed in the Hawaiian Islands, and not to exceed 10 per cent of the amount so authorized and appropriated may be expended for the acquirement of land to be utilized in connection with such construction.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

STENOGRAPHER FOR COMMITTEE ON COAST DEFENSES.

Mr. CURTIS, from the Committee on Coast Defenses, to which was referred Senate resolution 39 submitted by him on the 9th instant, authorizing the committee to employ a stenographer, asked to be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, which was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. PAYNTER:

A bill (S. 2357) for the relief of J. Knight Lowery; and

A bill (S. 2358) for the relief of James R. Evans; to the Committee on Claims.

ELECTION OF PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE.

Mr. CULBERSON. I ask unanimous consent to have printed as a Senate document in one document, first, Senate Report No. 3, Forty-fourth Congress, first session, being the report of Mr. Morton from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, January 6, 1876, on the tenure of office of the President pro tempore of the Senate; second, the proceedings of the Senate on March 12, 1890, on the subject of the resolution reported from the Committee on Privileges and Elections as to the election of President pro tempore, and so forth, being principally speeches, short speeches, of Senators George, Turpie, and Evarts. (S. Doc. No. 30.)

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the order will be entered.

SAMUEL GOMPERS ET AL. V. BUCK'S STOVE & RANGE CO.

Mr. GORE. I ask unanimous consent to have printed as a Senate document the opinion of the United States Supreme Court, handed down on yesterday, in what is known as the case of Samuel Gompers, John Mitchell, and Frank Morrison, petitioners, v. The Buck's Stove & Range Co. (S. Doc. No. 33.)

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LODGE in the chair). Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Oklahoma? The Chair hears none, and the order is entered.

CONSTRUCTION OF FAVORED-NATION CLAUSE.

Mr. PENROSE. I have a letter, addressed to the Committee on Finance, from the Secretary of State, containing a memorandum prepared by his direction, relative to the construction of the most-favored-nation clause in treaties of the United States. I ask unanimous consent to have the same printed as a public document. (S. Doc. No. 29.)

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks that the document he sends to the desk, prepared under the direction of the Secretary of State, together with the letter of the Secretary, be printed as a public document. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

ELECTION OF PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the election of a President pro tempore of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BACON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE], which I transfer to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], and vote. I vote for the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN].

Mr. BORAH (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP], who is not present. I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. BROWN (when his name was called). On this question I have a pair for the day with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE]. I therefore withhold my vote. I desire this statement to stand for the rest of the roll calls.

Mr. CULLOM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NIXON] and vote. I vote for the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER].

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama (when the name of Mr. DAVIS was called). I desire to announce for the day that the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. DAVIS] is paired with the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LORIMER] on this question.

Mr. DILLINGHAM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], which I transfer to the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON]. I make this announcement for the entire afternoon. I vote for the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER].

Mr. DIXON (when his name was called). I am paired for the day with the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. BOURNE]. If he were present, I should vote for the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], but the Senator from Oregon being absent, I withhold my vote, and announce this pair for the remainder of the day.

Mr. GUGGENHEIM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. PAYNTER], who is unavoidably detained. I therefore withhold my vote, and make this announcement for the balance of the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (when the name of Mr. LODGE was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN]. If he were present, I should vote for the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] and the Senator from Virginia would vote for the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON]. I make this announcement for the day.

Mr. McCUMBER (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. PERCY]. Were he present, he would vote for the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] and I should vote for the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. I make this statement as a reason for not voting during the day upon this subject.

Mr. SHIVELY (when the name of Mr. MARTIN of Virginia was called). The senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] is unavoidably absent from the Senate. He is paired with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. If the Senator from Virginia were present, he would vote for the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON]. I desire this announcement to stand for the day.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. RICHARDSON]. I transfer that to the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], and vote. I vote for the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON].

The roll call having been concluded, it resulted as follows:

FOR MR. BACON—30.

Bailey	Hitchcock	Overman	Swanson
Bankhead	Johnston, Ala.	Rayner	Taylor
Bryan	Kern	Reed	Terrell

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-eight Senators have voted; 35 necessary to a choice. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] has 30, the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] has 29, the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] has 7, the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] has 1, and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] has 1. There is no choice. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BACON (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair and its transfer, I vote for the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN].

Mr. BORAH (when his name was called). I make the same announcement that I made on the previous call.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE (when Mr. BOURNE's name was called). I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. BOURNE] is unavoidably detained from the Senate. If he were present he would vote for the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP].

Mr. CULLOM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. NIXON], and vote. I vote for the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER].

Mr. GUGGENHEIM (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. PAYNTER].

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina (when his name was called). I again announce my general pair with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. RICHARDSON] and the transfer of that pair to the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE]. I ask that this announcement stand for the balance of the day. I vote for the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON].

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. GORE. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. OWEN] is necessarily absent from the Senate and from the city on account of illness in his family. I make this announcement to stand for the day.

The roll call resulted as follows:

FOR MR. BACON—31.

Bailey	Hitchcock	O'Gorman	Stone
Bankhead	Johnson, Me.	Overman	Swanson

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On this roll call 69 Senators have voted; necessary to a choice 35. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] has 31; the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] has 29; the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] has 7; the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] has 1; and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] has 1. There is no choice.

NATHAN STRAUS PASTEURIZED MILK LABORATORY.

Mr. BORAH. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House Joint Resolution No. 39.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator from Idaho to withhold his motion for a moment that I may ask for the consideration of a bill to which I am sure there will be no objection.

Mr. BORAH. I withhold the motion.

Mr. GALLINGER. A few days ago I asked unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (S. 26) to authorize the acceptance by the United States of the gift of the Nathan Straus Pasteurized Milk Laboratory.

The Senator from Texas objected to it, and I think quite properly, and suggested certain amendments which have been agreed upon.

I now ask consideration for the bill, and I will offer the amendments which I think will remove all opposition to the bill. The bill has been read. It is a bill to authorize the acceptance by the United States of the gift of the Nathan Straus Pasteurized Milk Laboratory.

Mr. CULBERSON. Let the title of the bill be read.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have just read it. It is the bill (S. 26) to authorize the acceptance by the United States of the gift of the Nathan Straus Pasteurized Milk Laboratory.

The Senator from Texas has, upon consultation with me, satisfied himself that the amendments I will offer are very proper, and he does not object to the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill stated by him. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. On page 2, in lines 12 and 13, I move to strike out the words "the practical utility of infants' milk depots in the reduction of infant mortality" and the comma.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, lines 14 and 15, strike out the words "the practical utility of infants' milk depots in the reduction of infant mortality" and the comma.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. In line 19 of the bill that I hold in my hand strike out the words "or sell" after the word "give."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On line 21, after the word "give," strike out the words "or sell."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. In the next line, strike out the comma after the word "products," and the words "at prices to be fixed by him."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. In line 22, after the word "products," strike out the comma and the words "at prices to be fixed by him."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. In line 25, as it is here, after the words "may make," strike out the semicolon and insert a period, and strike out the remainder of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, line 3, after the words "may make," strike out the semicolon and insert a period, and strike out the remainder of the bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHIVELY. I wish the Senator from New Hampshire would again indicate the precise words that he has had stricken out in lines 12 and 13.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator has the same print that I have, we have stricken out in those lines the words "the practical utility of infants' milk depots in the reduction of infant mortality."

Mr. SHIVELY. I suggest to the Senator, if he will observe what is left there, whether it makes good sense?

Mr. GALLINGER. I think so. It will then read "for the purpose of investigating the relative value of pasteurized and raw milk for infant feeding, and for other appropriate scientific purposes." I think it reads all right.

Mr. SHIVELY. You begin by striking out the word "practical"?

Mr. GALLINGER. The word "practical."

Mr. SHIVELY. I thought you began by striking out the word "utility."

Mr. GALLINGER. No.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. GALLINGER, the title was amended so as to read: "A bill to authorize the acceptance by the United States of the gift of the Nathan Straus Pasteurized Milk Laboratory for the purpose of investigating the relative value of pasteurized and raw milk for infant feeding, and for other appropriate scientific purposes."

ELECTION OF SENATORS BY DIRECT VOTE.

Mr. BORAH. I ask unanimous consent to call up the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 39) proposing an amendment to the Constitution providing that Senators shall be elected by the people of the several States.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW].

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, whilst I was addressing the Senate yesterday upon the importance of taking up immediately certain questions upon which public opinion has been formed, and crystalizing them into legislation, I referred, among others, to the great questions of the combinations of capital called trusts which have assumed of late years so powerful and menacing an aspect.

I stated that although the antitrust act had been passed over 23 years ago, no substantial result had been reached under it; that if the Supreme Court in pending cases should declare these great organizations to be valid organizations, then it would be necessary to have legislation which would treat them as public monopolies and regulate them as we do other public utilities; that if, on the other hand, the Supreme Court should determine that these great organizations should be broken up into their constituent elements, it would be important for us to legislate regarding interstate trade, as to the size and the extent of the operations and the extent of the capitalization of corporations engaged in interstate trade; so that on the one hand we would have the benefit of the combination of great capital in the enterprises of the country, and, on the other hand, we would be able so to regulate them as to protect the country from the abuses which have up to this time existed.

The Supreme Court yesterday acted upon this matter with reference to one of the great trusts in a decision which applies to them all, and, as the result probably of the inertia and the inaction of Congress, has taken upon itself what the dissenting member of that court, Mr. Justice Harlan, declared to be judicial legislation, and has written into the statute words which Congress never put there. And so to-day we have a decision upholding the antitrust act so far as it applies to unreasonable restraint of trade.

The question therefore presents itself to us whether we are to permit in the future the administration regarding these great combinations to drift practically into the hands of the courts and subject the question as to the reasonableness or unreasonableness of any restraint upon trade imposed by these corporations now existing and to be brought into existence in the future to the varying judgments of different courts upon the facts and the law, or whether we will organize, as the servant of Congress, an administrative tribunal similar to the Interstate Commerce Commission, with powers of recommendation, with powers of condemnation, with powers of correction similar to those enjoyed by the Interstate Commerce Commission over interstate transportation.

NATIONAL INCORPORATION.

We are told that the President is now about to urge upon Congress the passage of a national incorporation act, with a view to meeting this question, and doubtless determining the extent to which these combinations may capitalize themselves, the number of plants which they may own, the extent of their operations, placing them all under national jurisdiction as national creations.

So far as I am concerned, Mr. President, for years I have advocated the full exercise of the power of Congress over interstate commerce, even though it led to the organization of the artificial beings that are to enter into interstate commerce. But I have confined my advocacy of the latter proposition entirely to corporations organized for transportation—to the railways of the country—for I realized that railroads were natural monopolies and must be treated as such, that we could not rely upon the States to create the agencies for interstate and national purposes, and that the very necessity of long and continuous interstate lines, extending from ocean to ocean and from the Lakes to the Gulf, requiring that the Nation itself should act in the creation of the artificial agents that would carry on these great enterprises.

My feeling upon this question was accentuated by reason of the fact that the railroads themselves had fallen into the custom of resorting to the States that had the least restriction upon corporate powers, to States which had not within their jurisdiction a mile of the railroad affected, for the creation of the corporate agents that would undertake these great interstate and national functions; and I thought that it was an abdication of the functions of the National Government to permit a single State, which under the Constitution has no power whatever over interstate commerce, which with the other States granted that power in its entirety to the Government of the United States, to organize the corporation which is to operate in many States. I thought it was an outrage to permit this thing to be done by legislation of a single State in which the people of the other States had no participation, and that the proper exercise of the national functions required that the Federal Government should take hold of the entire subject matter.

I felt that such corporations would be more likely to be efficiently restrained by legislation in which the people of all the States participated than by legislation in which the people of only a single State participated. But even with reference to this question, the incorporation of interstate railroads, I gradually modified my views, for I realized that many of the States were unwilling to give up their jurisdiction over the State corporation within their boundaries, engaged, as they were, in State transportation as well as interstate transportation; and so my mind gradually drifted to a method of procedure by which the National Congress would organize not corporations that would own interstate railroads, but would organize corporations that would simply own the stock of State railroads, thus substituting national holding companies for the holding companies now created under the laws of such a State as New Jersey. I felt this would leave the individual corporations in the respective States now engaged in railroad transportation as State creations, absolutely subject to the jurisdiction of the State, so far as taxation, the police power, and State commerce were concerned, and would permit the unionizing, or, if we may so term it, the federalizing, of these State corporations through a national holding company, which would bind them together for the great national purposes of interstate commerce.

SENTIMENT OF PARTIES.

Now, Mr. President, I must admit that, so far as my own party in the Senate is concerned, the views which I entertain upon this subject have not made the headway I could wish. The Democratic Party believes in keeping power as near as possible in the hands of the people in the various localities, in the States, and entrusting to the National Government only those powers which are necessary for the national defense and for national purposes and in carefully scrutinizing the granted powers with a view to preventing any enlargement of national jurisdiction within the boundaries of the States. So the traditions and the principles of the Democratic Party have rather militated against the views which I have entertained, though I have absolute confidence of their correctness and am confident that these views will some time be incorporated in the laws of our country.

But we must take a practical view of this question. There was a time when a national incorporation act could pass Congress, and that was under the recommendation of a Republican President and by the action of a Republican House and a Republican Senate. But that condition of things exists no longer. The House is now Democratic. It will probably remain Democratic for years. The Republican ascendency in this body has been constantly diminishing and is now in danger. So I can not see any possibility within a reasonable time of the enactment of a national incorporation law even regarding railroads, much less regarding the commercial business of the country.

Now, the President contemplates this as his remedy for existing abuses, and we are told by the press that that recommendation is to be renewed and the bill which has been sleeping for so long a time in the Committee on the Judiciary will again be pressed. We all realize how futile such an endeavor will be; and it is therefore all the more incumbent upon us to determine at this session of Congress what is practicable, what will secure the assent of a Democratic House, what will secure the assent of a Senate under the control of a divided Republican Party.

It is absolutely necessary, therefore, for us to dismiss all partisan considerations. If anything is to be done, we must establish a modus vivendi as between the two great parties of the country, and passing some measure that does not contradict the principles or the traditions of either party, wait for the time when one or the other party is in complete and absolute power both in Congress and in the executive department.

Mr. President, why should we not, then, upon this great question, avail ourselves both of the lamp of reason, alluded to in a recent Supreme Court decision, and of the lamp of experience? What has been our experience regarding that branch of interstate commerce which covers transportation? Our experience has been that 20 years ago, just about the time the antitrust act was passed, Congress passed the interstate-commerce act, creating a commission as its servant to attend to its duties under rules prescribed by Congress. The regulation of interstate commerce belonged to Congress. Congress wisely saw that it could not undertake that regulation in all its details; that it could not pass rate bills which would be satisfactory to every section of the country; that it could not reduce rates that were claimed to be excessive and increase rates that were claimed to be too low; that it could not correct the varying abuses which creep into the administration of every great enterprise. Therefore it created this commission as its servant to carry out its will under rules established by it.

The history of the last 23 years proves the wisdom of our action. By a gradual process of evolution this commission, as the result of gradual improvements in legislation and as the result of constantly increasing powers recommended by it and affirmed by Congress, has become a tribunal second in importance only to the Supreme Court of the land. It has made transportation a science. It has studied all the intricate questions relating to it, and in a recent illuminating decision has formulated a great state paper that has impressed the country and the world with its wisdom.

Now, contrast that action with the other action taken by Congress regarding the trusts. It would have been possible 23 years ago, when the interstate-commerce act was passed, with reference to interstate trade to have established an industrial or trade commission or board similar to the Interstate Commerce Commission with reference to transportation. If we had done so and had put upon that commission the same class of men who have been appointed upon the Interstate Commerce Commission, we would have had the constant corrective power of that commission applied both to the existing trade corporations and to the trade corporations afterwards created. Many abuses would have been prevented. Many abuses would have been corrected. As a result of the constant study and inquiry of a competent board engaged in this work as a specialization recommendations would have been made to Congress which would have been accepted, as were those recommendations made with reference to interstate transportation, and a great body of administrative law would have been built up and combinations of capital would have been effected without the abuses which have existed during the past 23 years.

ENFORCEMENT OF ANTITRUST ACT BY ATTORNEY GENERAL.

But instead of that we determined to trust the matter to the courts, and we gave the enforcement of the antitrust act to the Attorney General's office. So far as the Attorney General's office is concerned, I have no criticism to make regarding the present incumbent, Mr. Wickersham. I believe that he has discharged his full duty under the law and that he has prosecuted these trusts with a vigor and a determination unequaled in the history of the Attorney General's office. But it must be apparent, if we finally get a decision from the Supreme Court of the United States correcting existing abuses only 23 years after the passage of the act, that there has been negligence in the past upon the part of the Attorney General's office. It is necessarily so. The Attorney General's office is an office of shifting incumbency. During one administration there were as many, I believe, as five Attorneys General. How could you have any sequence of action, any logical policy, with such constant changes.

The Attorney General's office is also, in a measure, a political office. The chief of that department is subject to the direction and control of the President of the United States. We know how in times of great political exigency these great corporations summon their powers and make even governmental administrations tremble when an election is at hand. We know that a great, vigorous, strenuous, courageous President was brought to his knees at a time of great financial exigency, when a crisis had involved the entire country in its embrace, when a process of destructive liquidation was threatened, when the bank reserves of the country were tied up in New York and were there loaned out in enterprises of speculation and promotion, when there was universal suspension of payment upon the part of the banks of the country, and a great and powerful corporation, the Steel Trust, anxious to absorb a rival, the Tennessee Coal & Iron Co., persuaded Mr. Roosevelt to believe that the only way of relieving the tension without panic and saving the country was to permit it to absorb the rival corporation. We all recall that he wrote a letter to the Attorney General practically instructing him to commence no proceedings regarding it.

So, whilst these matters have been made public, I can not doubt that in numerous other emergencies the zeal of the administration and the zeal of the Attorney General's office was restrained by the exigency of the hour, whether financial or political.

Mr. STONE. I wish to ask the Senator a question, with his permission.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

TENNESSEE COAL & IRON CO.

Mr. STONE. Does the Senator believe that the letter written by the President to the Attorney General instructing him not to proceed against the Steel Trust and to permit it to absorb a rival is binding upon this administration or this Attorney General or the country, morally or legally?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do not think it is. I wish to say, however, that I did not state that the President of the United States instructed the Attorney General to take no action. My recollection is that in a communication which was practically an instruction he gave his view of the transaction and indicated that he did not think it incumbent on the administration to intervene.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Do I understand the Senator from Nevada to complain that the antitrust act has not been enforced with sufficient vigor in the past?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Does the Senator recall that the party to which he belongs was in control of the Government very soon after the antitrust law was passed for a period of four years; and if so, can he tell us how many prosecutions were instituted during that administration?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I think there were very few.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Were there any?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do not know of any.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Is it not true that there was not a single one instituted?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do not know.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Is it not true, furthermore, that the Democratic Attorney General gave it as his opinion that the antitrust law was unconstitutional?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do not recall that.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Is it not true that no prosecutions were attempted under it during that Democratic administration?

Mr. NEWLANDS. But assuming that it is true, I do not propose for a moment to acquit a Democratic administration of any responsibility in this matter: I do not stand as a sponsor for the Cleveland administration. I never did. I felt always that the Cleveland administration was dominated by the same powers that have controlled the Republican Party in its legislative and administrative action. I am not making a political address. I am addressing myself to a system. I am not making an attack upon either party. I say it is in the highest degree unwise to turn over the administration of the great antitrust act to an office of shifting incumbency, subject to political influence and likely to be controlled by every exigency, political or financial.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

STANDARD OIL DECISION.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I was unable to hear that portion of the Senator's discussion of the recent decision of the Supreme Court in the Standard Oil case, but in so far as I did listen to his remarks, I understood him to express some disagreement with the opinion of the court on one or two points.

I wish to ask the Senator if he does not understand from the reported interview given out by the Attorney General that the decision was entirely satisfactory to the administration; and in this connection to call his attention to a statement prominently published in the Washington Post entitled "Attorney General Wickersham," in which he is reported to have said:

> Substantially every proposition contended for by the Government in this case is affirmed by the Supreme Court. In the reasoning by which the Chief Justice reaches the conclusion, in which the whole court concurs, he expresses the view that only contracts, combinations, etc., which in any way unreasonably or unduly restrain interstate trade and commerce, or which are unreasonably restrictive of competitive conditions, are within the prohibition of the first section of the Sherman Act.

I wish in this connection, with the Senator's permission, to direct attention, assuming that that expresses the present attitude of the administration, to quite a remarkable change which seems to have taken place in the views of the administration on that subject; and I will beg his indulgence while I read one paragraph from the special message of the President of the United States to Congress, transmitted to the Senate January 7, 1910. I read from page 14 of that message:

The Supreme Court in several of its decisions has declined to read into the statute the word "unreasonable" before "restraint of trade"—

"Restraint of trade" is quoted—on the ground that the statute applies to all restraints and does not intend to leave to the court the discretion to determine what is a reasonable restraint of trade. The expression "restraint of trade" comes from the common law, and at common law there were certain covenants incidental to the carrying out of a main or principal contract which were said to be covenants in partial restraint of trade, and were held to be enforcible because "reasonably" adapted to the performance of the main or principal contract. And under the general language used by the Supreme Court in several cases, it would seem that even such incidental covenants in restraint of interstate trade were within the inhibition of the statute and must be condemned. In order to avoid such a result, I have thought and said that it might be well to amend the statute so as to exclude such covenants from its condemnation. A close examination of the later decisions of the court, however, shows quite clearly in cases presenting the exact question, that such incidental restraints of trade are held not to be within the law and are excluded by the general statement that, to be within the statute, the effect upon the trade of the restraint must be direct and not merely incidental or indirect. The necessity, therefore, for an amendment of the statute so as to exclude these incidental and beneficial covenants in restraint of trade held at common law to be reasonable does not exist.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I have to say that I indulged in no words of disapproval regarding the decision of the Supreme Court. I simply stated that the dissenting member of that court, Justice Harlan——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I beg pardon of the Senator. Will he permit me to read one further extract from the message in that same connection?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I read from page 16 of the same message:

Many people conducting great businesses have cherished a hope and a belief that in some way or other a line may be drawn between "good trusts" and "bad trusts," and that it is possible by amendment to the antitrust law to make a distinction under which good combinations may be permitted to organize, suppress competition, control prices, and do it all legally if only they do not abuse the power by taking too great profit out of the business. They point with force to certain notorious trusts as having grown into power through criminal methods by the use of illegal rebates and plain cheating, and by various acts utterly violative of business honesty or morality, and urge the establishment of some legal line of separation by which "criminal trusts" of this kind can be punished, and they, on the other hand, be permitted under the law to carry on their business. Now, the public, and especially the business public, ought to rid themselves of the idea that such a distinction is practicable or can be introduced into the statute. Certainly under the present antitrust law no such distinction exists. It has been proposed, however, that the word "reasonable" should be made a part of the statute, and then that it should be left to the court to say what is a reasonable restraint of trade, what is a reasonable suppression of competition, what is a reasonable monopoly. I venture to think that this is to put into the hands of the court a power impossible to exercise on any consistent principle which will insure the uniformity of decision essential to just judgment. It is to thrust upon the courts a burden that they have no precedents to enable them to carry, and to give them a power approaching the arbitrary, the abuse of which might involve our whole judicial system in disaster.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I was remarking that I made no indication of disapproval of any part of the decision of the Supreme Court. I merely referred to the fact that the dissenting member of that court, Mr. Justice Harlan, had declared that the decision was a piece of judicial legislation. I called attention to the fact—and it seems that I am sustained by the President in that view—that if the various courts of the country, according to varying conditions, were hereafter to be called upon to determine as to whether a restraint of trade thus imposed by these corporations was reasonable or unreasonable, we could not expect any very satisfactory administration of the law, particularly in view of the fact that it has taken 23 years for us to ascertain what the law means, and in order to ascertain that it has been necessary, according to the views of Mr. Justice Harlan, to read into the statute certain words that are not there.

Mr. President, I am not commenting upon this for the purpose of criticizing the Attorney General's office or the President of the United States or the court, nor have I made reference to President Roosevelt with a view of criticizing him for his action. I have no doubt he acted patriotically under the then existing conditions, that he felt the great peril of the hour, and that he yielded, under compulsion, to action which he thought necessary in order to prevent a greater disaster than was consummated by the action which he approved. I am attacking this system of turning over the administration of our legislation regarding interstate trade to the Attorney General's office or to courts, when we should create a great administrative tribunal like the Interstate Commerce Commission, charged with powers over interstate trade similar to those possessed by that tribunal regarding transportation. I have claimed that if such a commission had been organized 23 years ago when the antitrust law was passed, these vast accumulations of menacing capital would have been prevented, that all the advantages of combination of capital would have been secured without the attendant abuses, and that we would have been saved the economic wrench that is now to take place through the dissolution of these giant combinations and the restoration of their constituent elements. I insist upon it that at this extraordinary session of Congress, with six months before us unembarrassed by general legislation, by appropriation bills, and by other matters that usually distract our attention, we have the opportunity to take up this great question in connection with the reciprocity bill and tariff matters and to press it to a wise solution.

THE TIME FAVORABLE FOR PROGRESSIVE LEGISLATION.

Why, Mr. President, how could there be a more favorable time? It is true that the heat of summer is about to intervene, but we could hold our sessions until the 1st of July and resume them upon the 1st of September, and thus secure the necessary rest and vacation, leaving us four or five months to legislate upon these important matters.

As it is, we have been here a month and have practically done nothing. We have not even as yet reached complete organization. Our committees, with the exception of the Finance Committee, are idle. Why can not the Interstate Commerce Committee or the Committee on the Judiciary be sitting at the same time that our Finance Committee is, and take up the great question of interstate trade? Why during this period can not our Commerce Committee, in charge of rivers and harbors, shape a measure for our action that will provide for the regulation of the flow of our rivers and for navigation, for inland waterway transportation, furnishing constructive machinery for this great work through boards of experts composed of the chiefs of the great services that are now working on detached parts of this problem, to whom can be added great engineers and constructors, so that the Nation within its jurisdiction and the States within their jurisdiction, by a system of cooperation, can work out a great plan of regulating river flow by the storage of flood waters in the arid regions, spreading them over the arid lands, and causing the desert to bloom by taking up these waters in artificial reservoirs and holding them for the development of water power and preventing them from adding to the destructive floods below; taking hold of great areas of swamp lands, and so controlling destructive streams as to open up vast areas of fertile soil to cultivation—all done not by usurpation of power by the Nation over the States, but by cooperation of the Nation with the States, each sovereignty acting within its jurisdiction and doing its work under plans devised by all with a proper apportionment of costs and benefits? Why should not that great committee, now idle, take up that question whilst the Finance Committee is holding its sessions and report a bill, possibly for action at this session of Congress, but certainly for action at the next session, so that the greatest constructive problem of the time may be satisfactorily solved?

BANKING.

Then there is another question—the banking question. Is there any question more pressing than that before the country to-day? We have, according to the statement of Mr. Aldrich, the late chairman of the Finance Committee of the Senate, the worst banking system that any civilized country of the world has, a banking system under which our banks have not become, as they should be, great machines of exchange, permitting the sale of products between individuals and communities and sections and furnishing the circulating medium through which the sales can be closed, but have been turned into great machines of promotion and speculation, absorbing the cash reserves of the country, tying them up, and then calmly inviting the country banks to suspend payment when an emergency comes.

Are we content to permit these annual or biennial or triennial or decennial breaks in exchange to continue, paralyzing the business of the country, paralyzing trade between communities and sections and States? Are we to take up this question as a question intrusted to the jurisdiction of the Nation alone through the grant of the States, the only right of the States upon the subject matter being to demand of the Union of States that it should fully and beneficially exercise the power granted?

Banks constitute the machinery of exchange. The functions of the banks have been perverted. In order to make them efficient instruments of exchange they must have ample capital as a protection to their depositors; they must keep ample reserves as a protection against the demands of their depositors; and yet Congress has never legislated as to what proportion the capital of a bank shall bear to its obligations to its depositors. A bank with a capital of $50,000 can accept deposits to the extent of $50,000,000, and the only security that the depositors have is the reserve of their own money within the bank and the $50,000 capital of such a bank.

When banking was a science the laws of the various States absolutely required that no bank should loan its depositors money in excess of five times its capital, thus compelling the banks all the time to maintain a capital equal to 20 per cent of their deposit obligations. Yet the Congress of the United States has made no requirement upon this subject.

Our system ought to be a model system for every State in the Union, but, as the result of our carelessness and indifference upon this subject, the States themselves, formerly careful in this matter, have relaxed their care and within the last decade we have seen companies, misnamed trust companies, with small capital and large deposits, spring up in the various States, and it is these banks that have menaced the safety of the country, oftentimes involving the national banks themselves. It is our function, so long as a State bank engages in interstate commerce, to compel it to maintain the safety appliances that will make it an efficient instrumentality of exchange. We have the same power with reference to a State bank that we have with reference to a State railroad—the State bank engaging in interstate commerce and the State railroad engaging in interstate transportation—to compel either the State bank or the State railroad to apply the safety device that is necessary to make the one an efficeint instrumentality of exchange and the other an efficient instrumentality of transportation.

And yet we have done nothing upon this score, and the State banks of the country, under the example of the national banks, relaxing their old-time caution, have been organized with insufficient reserves, some trust companies keeping on hand only 2 or 3 per cent of their deposit obligations. This is the way in which Congress has acted upon that branch of interstate commerce, exclusively intrusted to its jurisdiction—the question of interstate exchange.

As I said yesterday, a system of transportation which would permit breaks here and there by the removal of tracks or by the removal of bridges would be regarded as intolerable, and if it involved interstate transportation the hand of the Interstate Commerce Commission would be laid upon such delinquency. Yet we permit similar breaks in the exchanges of the country to occur through our neglect of the proper precautions of legislation. No wonder the distinguished former Senator from Rhode Island, Mr. Aldrich, declared our system to be the worst banking system in the world. And now, instead of Congress addressing itself purely to the question of compelling national banks and State banks engaged in interstate commerce to maintain an adequate capital and an adequate reserve, instead of devising means by which they can be associated together in State associations for mutual protection and for the insurance of their depositors, the attention of the country is being directed by the Monetary Commission to a plan for practically reviving the old central-bank system—an improvement it may be, yet a central-bank system. And that, too, at a time when the Democratic Party is coming into power, or, rather, when it is increasing its power all the time in this body and is now sharing the responsibility of government with the Republican Party, and is likely to come into full power—a party whose traditions are against the creation of a central bank.

If this be so, and if the Republican Party is powerless, even if it had the will, to create a central banking system, is it not wise in this condition of things to establish a modus vivendi as to the banking question; to reach out for reforms that are within reach and which do not involve the principles or the traditions of either party? Why should not some committee of this body be sitting upon that question during these next five months instead of leaving it to the Finance Committee, which is already overcharged with labor? Why should not that whole question be referred to the Interstate Commerce Committee, which has jurisdiction of the question of interstate exchange and which could act on this question while the Finance Committee is deliberating upon matters relating to the tariff?

MERCHANT MARINE.

Mr. President, there is another question that is in the public mind, and that is the creation of a merchant marine. The Republican Party has stood for ship subsidy, although as yet it has not been able to put very extensive legislation upon the statute book in that regard. It is now powerless to accomplish its wish, for the Democratic Party is in power in the House and the Republican Party has not a sufficiently harmonious majority in this body to enable to carry out its will here.

What can we do with reference to foreign commerce as a nonpartisan measure? We all know that our Navy is an ill-proportioned Navy, a Navy composed almost exclusively of fighting ships without the auxiliary ships—the transports, the scouts, the dispatch boats, and the colliers—necessary to support the fighting ships in case of war. We all know that when our Navy took its trip around the world we were compelled to call upon other nations to furnish the transports and the colliers that were required, and one of the arguments that is used in favor of subsidizing a merchant marine is that it will furnish American bottoms that will be of use in case of the exigency of war.

THE NAVY.

Now, what can we do to make a well-proportioned Navy, to make a Navy that can sustain itself, that in case of war will not be dependent upon foreign powers that may under the law of neutrality furnish or refuse the necessary auxiliary ships? Obviously our duty is to create a well-proportioned Navy instead of an ill-proportioned Navy; to stop for the time building these fighting ships and to build the auxiliary ships which will support the fighting ships. But, you say, these ships will be useful only in case of war. That is true. Their final use will come then. But in times of peace why should we not let out these ships, manned in part by the Naval Reserves which we are training for our fighting ships, to open up new routes of commerce, the routes of commerce to South America, to Australia, and to Africa, which have been advocated, and thus utilize these ships in times of war as auxiliaries to the naval vessels, to the fighting ships, and in times of peace in aid of the promotion of commerce?

The Republican Party has thus far been opposed to such a measure. It was not satisfactory to the great interests of the country that desired subsidies for commercial enterprises.

But now, when the Republican Party realizes that it has not the power to execute its will, will not its patriotism lead it to advance our merchant marine, and at the same time to create a well-proportioned and efficient Navy, by action such as I have suggested? Why should not the great Committee on Commerce, hitherto engaged exclusively in this direction in the consideration of subsidy measures, take up a great constructive measure like this and, with the aid of the Naval Committee, create a system that will give us a well-proportioned Navy instead of an inefficient Navy—a Navy composed of both fighting and supporting ships instead of ships that, without the necessary ships to support them, would be derelicts on the ocean in case of war?

PROGRESSIVE ACTION DEMANDED.

Mr. President, I have thus far, perhaps, addressed myself to the dominant party in urging that there should be a modus vivendi established in legislation, that we should unite now upon measures that will be beneficial to the public at large and concerning which public opinion is made up. But I am aware that I am addressing a party which, while having the nominal majority, is a party without practical responsibility, a divided party, composed on the one hand of regular, stalwart, and near progressive Republicans and on the other of progressive Republicans, 13 or 14 in number.

The entrance of these progressive Republicans into this body has been like a breath of ozone, invigorating the atmosphere. I welcome them. Every progressive Democrat welcomes them. But a responsibility rests upon them. They stand for certain reforms with which the Democratic Party is in sympathy. It is possible to organize this House in the interest of progressive legislation from President pro tempore down. It is possible by our action to put upon the statute book every nonpartisan reform to which I have referred. If this extra session fails, the responsibility will be ours. I mean the mingled responsibility of Democrats and progressive Republicans. We can not charge it upon the reactionary element of the Republican Party. Ours is the power and ours is the responsibility.

I trust, therefore, that some method will be devised, not by hidden and secret agreement, not by methods unexposed to the public eye, but in the open Senate, before the entire people, by which men of like thought regarding measures involving progressive reforms of great moment to the country can act together, and I believe such action will be regarded by the country as indicating that the Senate of the United States is again self-governing, that it is not controlled either by mere chance or by a few of the elder statesmen.

I suggest, therefore, that we take up the legislative program which I have offered and determine what of the proposed legislation we shall take up at this session, and what we shall instruct our committees to report upon for legislative action at the regular session, and that, taking a recess during July and August, we apply our best efforts for the remaining months between now and next December in an earnest effort to meet the popular demands regarding reform and constructive legislation.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask for a brief executive session.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Illinois moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, May 17, 1911, at 2 o'clock p. m.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate May 16, 1911.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, May 16, 1911.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

With unfeigned love and gratitude we would sing Thy praise, O God our Father, for life and its far-reaching purposes. We bless Thee that under the Constitution of these United States of America each citizen is permitted to think his own thoughts, enjoy the fruits of his own honest industry, and worship Thee according to the dictates of his own conscience. Help us to remember that each is but a unit in the great human family, bound together by ties so delicately adjusted that what helps one helps all, what hurts one hurts all; that we may think and act in consonance with the golden rule, striving earnestly day by day to do unto others as we would be done by. In the spirit of the Lord Jesus Chirst. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday, May 12, 1911, was read and approved.

UNITED STATES STEEL CORPORATION.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up for consideration a privileged report from the Committee on Rules on House resolution 148.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas calls up a privileged report from the Committee on Rules, based on a certain resolution which he names, and the Clerk will report the resolution first and then read the report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 148——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois will state it.

Mr. MANN. This resolution is on the Union Calendar, I notice. Does it require consideration in the Committee of the Whole?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I think not.

Mr. MANN. Then it ought not to be on the Union Calendar.

The SPEAKER. One of two things is true about it; it either ought not to be on the Union Calendar; or if it is on the Union Calendar, it ought to be considered in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent that the resolution be placed on the House Calendar.

Mr. MANN. Well, I do not think it belongs on the House Calendar. I should prefer the gentleman to ask unanimous consent to consider it. I was going to reserve the point of order that it was not privileged, but I shall not insist upon the point of order it is not privileged, but I reserve it for a moment for the purpose of calling attention of gentlemen who make privileged reports to the fact that under the rules a privileged report must be presented in the House. It can not be presented by dropping it in the basket. This report was presented by dropping it in the basket and not presented on the floor of the House. I shall not insist upon that point of order, because I understand——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois undoubtedly states the rule correctly. There is no question about it.

Mr. MANN. And I suggest to the gentleman from Texas that he ask unanimous consent to consider it in the House as in Committee of the Whole House. I have no objection to that.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to that. I think the gentleman is technically correct, but this practice has been pursued in regard to these resolutions from the Committee on Rules——

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman is mistaken——

Mr. HENRY of Texas. And I ask unanimous consent that the resolution be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman is mistaken about the practice, because this one instance is hardly to be given as the practice.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I do not refer to this one instance. I have looked at others, but it makes no difference to me, and I would make the request which the gentleman desires——

The SPEAKER. What is the request?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. That the resolution be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that this resolution and report thereon be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole House. Is there objection?

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Texas yield to the gentleman from Louisiana?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. For a question.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Which resolution is that?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. This is resolution 148, known as the Steel Trust resolution, introduced by Mr. STANLEY.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas will suspend a moment. Inasmuch as this is a matter that the Chair would like to hear a part of, the Chair would like to have order so that the matter can be heard. Is there any objection to the consideration of the report?

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman how much debate is the gentleman going to have on this resolution?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I am willing to have all the debate that is necessary and desirable. I would ask the gentleman on the other side how much he desires?

Mr. MANN. I do not think that there is anybody that wants to be heard at length on this side. I apprehend that there is no difficulty about that.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I think we can get through in an hour, and I propose that we divide the hour equally.

Mr. MANN. I think we can settle that later. That can be arranged. The gentleman from Kentucky will probably want some time, and perhaps others will desire time.

Mr. AUSTIN. I want some time.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Very well.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the resolution called up by the gentleman from Texas? The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the resolution and then the report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 148.

Resolved, That a committee of nine Members, to be elected by the House, be, and is hereby, directed to make an invesigation for the purpose of ascertaining whether there have occurred violations by the United States Steel Corporation, or other corporations or persons as hereinafter set out, of the antitrust act of July 2, 1890, and the acts supplementary thereto, the various interstate-commerce acts, and the acts relative to the national banking associations, which violations have not been prosecuted by the executive officers of the Government; and if any such violations are disclosed said committee is directed to report the facts and circumstances to the House.

Said committee is also directed to investigate the United States Steel Corporation, its organization and operation, and if in connection therewith violations of law as aforesaid are disclosed, to report the same.

Said committee shall inquire whether said steel corporation has any relations or affiliations in violation of law with the Pennsylvania Steel Co., the Cambria Steel Co., the Lackawanna Steel Co., or any other iron or steel company.

Also whether said steel corporation, through the persons owning its stock, its officers or agents, has or has had any relation with the Pennsylvania Railroad Co., or any other railroad company, or any coal companies, national banking companies, trust companies, insurance companies, or other corporate organizations or companies, or with the stockholders, directors, or other officers or agents of said companies, or with any person or persons, which have caused or have a tendency to cause any of the results following:

First. The restriction or destruction of competition in production, sale, or transportation.

Second. Excessive capitalization and bonding of corporations.

Third. Combinations created by ownership or control by one corporation or the stockholders or bondholders thereof of the stock or bonds of other corporations, or combinations between the officers or agents of one corporation and the officers or agents of other corporatins by duplication of directors or other means and devices.

Fourth. Speculations in stocks and bonds by agreement among officers and agents of corporations to depress the value of the stocks and bonds of other corporations for the purpose of acquiring or controlling same.

Fifth. Profits through such speculation to officers or agents of such corporations to the detriment of the stockholders and the public.

Sixth. Panics in the bond, stock, and money markets.

Said committee shall in its report recommend such further legislation by Congress as in its opinion is desirable.

Said committee as a whole or by subcommittee is authorized to sit during sessions of the House and the recess of Congress, to employ clerical and other assistance, to compel the attendance of witnesses, to send for persons and papers, and to administer oaths to witnesses.

The Speaker shall have authority to sign and the Clerk to attest subpœnas during the recess of Congress.

The Committee on Rules, to whom was referred House resolution No. 148, to investigate violations of the antitrust act of 1890 and other acts, have considered the same and beg leave to report with the recommendation that it do pass, with the following amendment: In line 10, page 20, add the letter "s" to the word "relation."

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois now if we can not have some understanding as to the time during which the discussion is to be carried on.

Mr. MANN. I suggest that the gentleman proceed. I do not think there will be objection as to time, so far as I am concerned. I do not think anybody desires to be heard more than a minute or two on this side.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I think we can get through in an hour.

Mr. MANN. I do not think there is anyone on this side who desires to answer the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY], but there may be. I do not know.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Then I take it, Mr. Speaker, that I shall be entitled to an hour, and I now yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY].

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Speaker, this is a resolution providing for an investigation of the United States Steel Corporation. I do not mean in five minutes to make any argument in favor of the passage of this resolution by referring to or defending in detail the provisions of the resolution, as that would require a much greater time. I am convinced that every lawyer in the House who has investigated this question will have but little doubt that the dicta of the Supreme Court in the Northern Securities case touching holding companies applies in the case of the formation of the United States Steel Corporation. In other words, the organization of the United States Steel Corporation, both by the character of its charter and by virtue of the circumstances under which that charter was made and the purpose which it was intended to subserve, render it strictly and technically a combination in restraint of trade.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. In "unreasonable restraint of trade"——

Mr. STANLEY. Yes; according to the new law. I will not discuss the new law just passed by the Supreme Court of the United States. [Laughter.]

In addition to that, it is manifest to those who have studied the operations of the United States Steel Corporation, this matter having been previously investigated to a certain extent in the Senate, that this concern has operated in restraint of trade by the absorption of actively competing concerns. The most manifest instance of this violation of law was the taking over of the Tennessee Coal & Iron Co. The absorption of this competitor, even for a legitimate purpose, in the light of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, both in the Northern Securities case and the Addystone Pipe case, and what cursory examination I have been able to make of the decision just rendered in the case of the United States against the Standard Oil Co., was and would have been illegal even if it had been a purchase in the usual order of things. As it was, this concern was not purchased. It was coerced into a surrender, having been paid but a nominal sum—a mere fraction of the actual value of that property. I believe that those who have investigated this question carefully will find that each one of these specific acts or abuses named in this resolution can be sustained by an abundance of proof.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. STANLEY. Certainly.

Mr. SIMS. Does the gentleman contemplate legislation to follow this investigation?

Mr. STANLEY. It would be hard to answer that question. As far as I am personally concerned, I believe an investigation of this question will bring before the country facts that will justify Congress in acting both in the passing of additional legislation and in a resolution, perhaps, or direction to the judiciary department of the Government to take such steps as may be necessary to dissolve the concern.

Mr. SIMS. It is, then, in the nature of a goad to the Department of Justice?

Mr. STANLEY. It is in the nature of an ancillary operation; I would not call it a goad. We can be of material assistance to the Department of Justice in preparing that part of its case which needs substantial facts.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN].

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I have no personal interest in the United States Steel Corporation. I am neither a stockholder nor a bondholder, and what I may have to say on this subject I say in the interest of my country. I do not believe in the kind of legislation which is seeking every opportunity to embarrass the commercial and manufacturing development of our country. I believe that we have reached that period in the history of our country when we must have large combinations of capital to not only develop the splendid resources of our fair land and find constant employment for our great army of wage earners but those that are coming here from foreign shores at the rate of a million a year.

In the present splendid development of our resources we have reached a point where we not only manufacture more than we can possibly consume ourselves, but we must find an outlet and a market for our surplus in foreign lands in order to keep every mill busy and every American wage earner employed.

Now, gentlemen, if we are to inaugurate a war upon every movement looking to a consolidation of the manufacturing interests in this country, we are not only going to embarrass and injure our manufacturing development, but we are going to drive out of the field of investment men who have the needed money to carry forward the industrial development of our country and keep busy an immense army of wage earners. I believe in the proper and just control of every trust or combine or corporation, but I do not believe in carrying that control to a point that means not only destruction to the invested millions of our American citizens, but curtailing the output of the mill, the mine, and the factory.

This corporation that we are now seeking to investigate last year turned out and sold more than $750,000,000 of manufactured goods. When it was originally organized its export business was valued at $2,000,000. Last year it had so developed and extended its splendid foreign business, under Mr. James A. Farrell, that its exports had grown to almost $100,000,000. An increase from $2,000,000 to $100,000,000 means something when it comes to measure this additional prosperity in America. A hundred million dollars in foreign exports and $650,000,000 goods sold in our home market means wages—employment for more than 200,000 American workingmen.

Now, gentlemen on both sides of this Chamber talk about "competition." Why, gentlemen, the time of "cut-throat" competition among sensible business men has long since passed away, and if we by legislation seek to force a return to that era then we will not only silence thousands of mills in this land to-day, but we will prevent the future investment of millions in the development of our resources and in the conduct of our commercial and manufacturing affairs.

I am a southern Representative on the floor of this House. I do not complain at the purchase of the Tennessee Coal, Iron & Railroad Co. by the United States Steel Corporation, for it has not proven to be an injury to the South. It has been a great benefit. I say that statement can not be challenged, and the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], in whose district this great corporation is largely interested, will not say that the absorption of that plant by the Steel Corporation has not brought millions for the improvement and the extension of an almost bankrupt, crippled corporation, giving it new life.

I remember two years ago when the officers of the steel corporation took to the city of Birmingham the director general of the Argentine railroad system, and as a result of that trip a single order for 75,000 tons of steel rails, bringing $2,250,000, was placed in the mills of Birmingham. The hope of the South in the development of its inexhaustible resources is in the encouragement of such companies as the United States Steel Corporation, with their countless millions, to build mills, furnaces, and factories to give employment to our people, and bring millions into the circulation of the South by the sale of iron and steel products in our South American and other markets which will be opened up by the construction of the Panama Canal. [Applause.]

I thank the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] for his kindness in yielding me additional time.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, does the gentleman from Illinois desire to consume any time?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I may want a moment, but nothing more unless there is to be further discussion.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK], as I understand, desired to address the House for a few minutes. I see he is not present, and if the gentleman from Illinois will use 5 or 10 minutes now I will be very glad.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I can not use that much time.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I will yield the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, so far as I know, there is no objection on this side of the House to the investigation proposed by the resolution. We recognize the right of the majority to investigate all questions of this kind and hope that the result of the investigation may be for the benefit of the public good, and not merely for partisan use. Whether that hope is futile or not depends upon the result which we will await, prepared at all times to defend the proposition that the policy of the Republican Party is not to build up trusts or monopolies, but to prevent their creation and the abuses which may occur through them.

I do not think it is my duty under the circumstances to consume time for the benefit of some gentleman who is not yet prepared or who is not in the Hall. However, Mr. Speaker, I prepared some years ago a memorandum of the law on the subject of congressional investigations for my own use if I should have occasion to make use of anything of the sort, and, as it represented some little labor, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD so as to insert this for the use of any Member who has occasion to study the subject.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. RANDELL of Texas). The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD as indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The memorandum referred to is as follows:

IN RE CONGRESSIONAL INVESTIGATIONS.

In drafting a resolution or a law creating a committee or a commission and authorizing it to conduct an investigation for the purpose of securing information to be subsequently reported to Congress, certain principles, announced by the courts in cases involving the legality of governmental investigations, should be borne in mind. A review of the decisions of the Supreme Court in this class of cases discloses the fact that previous investigations which have failed met the disapproval of the courts because the acts of Congress authorizing them were insufficient, and not because of any lack of power in that body to make investigations. It is therefore of the utmost importance that mistakes and errors pointed out by the courts in the laws authorizing previous investigations be avoided. The leading cases announce the following principles:

SCOPE AND EXTENT OF CONGRESSIONAL INVESTIGATIONS.

Congress may authorize a committee or a commission to obtain information upon any subject which, in its judgment, it may be important to possess. (In re Pacific Ry. Com., 32 F. R., 241, 250; 1887.)

Interstate Commerce Commission v. Brimson (154 U. S., 447, 472; 1893) holds, in effect, that the Constitution having given to Congress full power in the matter of regulating commerce that body may investigate the whole subject and in that way obtain full and accurate information; that for the purpose of regulating commerce Congress may invest a commission with authority to require and compel the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of papers and documents relating to any matter legally committed to it for investigation.

This case holds also that the twelfth section of the interstate-commerce act is constitutional and valid so far as it authorizes and requires the circuit courts of the United States to use their process in aid of inquiries which it holds Congress may lawfully authorize the Interstate Commerce Commission to make. That part of the draft of the proposed resolution, herewith submitted, which authorizes the same aid, follows the language of that section.

But the courts will not permit a governmental investigation to delve into the purely private affairs of the citizen unless it affirmatively appears that such investigation is material to matters over which Congress has jurisdiction and concerning which it may take some lawful action. (I. C. C. v. Brimson, 154 U. S., 447, 481, et seq., 1894; Entick v. Carrington, 19 Howell's State Trials, 1029; Kilbourne v. Thompson, 103 U. S., 168, 190–6, 1880; In re Chapman, 166 U. S., 661, 668–71, 1896.)

In Kilbourne v. Thompson (103 U. S., 168, 1880) a resolution, appointing a special committee and authorizing an investigation into the matter and history of the real-estate pool and the Jay Cooke & Co. settlement was held defective because it did not appear that the subject matter of the investigation was one concerning which Congress had jurisdiction or with reference to which it could take lawful action (p. 193).

The situation may be summarized thus: While Congress may authorize the collection, in the ordinary way, of information on any subject which it may deem of importance to possess, it may authorize the exercise of the extraordinary power of compelling the giving of testimony and the production of documents and papers only in cases where the information required is material to matters over which Congress has jurisdiction and concerning which it may take some lawful action. It is at this point that the power of the Government and the constitutional rights of the citizen meet, and it is here that governmental investigation reaches its limit.

In order, therefore, to lawfully entitle an investigating commission to forcibly compel the giving of testimony and the production of documents and papers, three things are essential.

First. The subject matter of the investigation must be one concerning which Congress has jurisdiction and with reference to which it may take lawful action.

Second. The resolution or statute creating the commission must describe in express terms the subject matter and should indicate clearly the object or purpose proposed to be accomplished by the investigation.

Third. The testimony, or the information contained in the papers and documents, which the commission forcibly seeks must be material and relevant to the subject matter which it is authorized to investigate.

If, therefore, a law authorizing an investigation contains these essential elements, the information pointed out may be secured notwithstanding it may be of a private or personal nature, providing, of course, the law contains a clause granting to witnesses immunity from future prosecution with respect to information which might tend to criminate them.

In this connection it is to be observed that if the information sought is material to the subject matter which the commission is authorized to investigate it may not be withheld on the ground that it is also material to some other subject which it has no right to inquire into. Inquiries of a commission of this character are not narrowly constrained by technical rules as to the admissibility of proof. Its function is one of inquiry, and it should not be hampered by those narrow rules which prevail in trials at common law where a strict correspondence is required between allegation and proof. (I. C. C. v. Baird, 194 U. S., 25, 44, 1904.)

PROVISIONS SUFFICIENT TO GRANT IMMUNITY TO WITNESSES.

Counselman v. Hitchcock (142 U. S., 547, 586, 1892) held that section 860, Revised Statutes, did not supply a complete protection against all the perils against which the fifth amendment to the Constitution was designed to guard, and was not a full substitute for that prohibition; that a statutory enactment to be valid must afford to a witness absolute immunity against future prosecution for the offense to which the question relates. While this case involved an investigation instituted by the Interstate Commerce Commission, section 12 of the interstate-commerce act, as it then stood, does not appear to have been passed on. That section followed the language of section 860, Revised Statutes, above referred to, however, and when that provision was declared insufficient and ineffectual that part of section 12 of the interstate-commerce act then in force was apparently abandoned. The act of February 11, 1893, was then passed to supply a provision which would be sufficient and effectual. It has so been held in Brown v. Walker (161 U. S., 591, 1895). The immunity provision of the draft of the proposed resolution herewith submitted follows the language of that act, which has been passed on and declared sufficient by the Supreme Court.

It is well to note, however, that the jurisdiction of an investigating commission is not extended because the resolution or act appointing it contains a provision granting to witnesses immunity from future prosecution. A statute granting immunity to witnesses does no more than deprive them of their right to refuse to answer questions or produce documents or papers which are material to the subject matter of a lawful investigation. It does not extend the jurisdiction of the commission; it only aids it in conducting investigations which it has a right to make.

PUNISHMENT OF CONTUMACIOUS WITNESSES.

As to the punishment of contumacious witnesses the case of Interstate Commerce Commission v. Brimson (154 U. S., 447, 485; 1893), holds that:

"Except in the particular instances enumerated in the Constitution and considered in Anderson v. Dunn (6 Wheat., 204) and in Kilbourn v. Thompson (103 U. S., 168, 190) of the exercise by either House of Congress of its right to punish disorderly behavior upon the part of its Members, and to compel the attendance of witnesses and the production of papers in election and impeachment cases, and in cases that may involve the existence of those bodies, the power to impose fine and imprisonment in order to compel the performance of a legal duty imposed by the United States, can only be exerted, under the law of the land, by a competent judicial tribunal having jurisdiction in the premises. See Whitcomb's case (120 Mass., 118) and authorities there cited."

In re Chapman (166 U. S., 661, 1897) holds that sections 102 and 104, Revised Statutes, for enforcing the attendance of witnesses, etc., are not open to the objection that they conflict with the Constitution; that Congress possesses constitutional power to enact a statute to enforce the attendance of witnesses and to compel them to make disclosure of evidence to enable the respective bodies to discharge their legislative functions; while Congress can not divest itself, or either of its Houses, of the inherent power to punish for contempt, it may provide that contumacy in a witness called to testify in a matter properly under consideration by either House, and deliberately refusing to answer questions pertinent thereto, shall be a misdemeanor against the United States.

In Interstate Commerce Commission v. Brimson (53 F. R., 476, 480; 1892), the court said:

"Undoubtedly Congress may confer upon a nonjudicial body authority to obtain information necessary for legitimate governmental purposes, and make refusal to appear and testify before it touching matters pertinent to any authorized inquiry an offense punishable by the courts," or subject witnesses "to penalties or forfeitures. A prosecution or an action for violation of such a statute would be clearly an original suit or controversy between parties within the meaning of the Constitution."

This part of the opinion of the lower court was expressly affirmed by the Supreme Court, notwithstanding the fact that in other particulars the decision was reversed. (I. C. C. v. Brimson, 154 U. S., 447, 469; 1894.)

That clause of the draft of the proposed resolution herewith submitted follows the language of the provision passed on in these cases, except that it omits the penalty of imprisonment which was stricken out by the Elkins law.

TENTATIVE DRAFT OF PROPOSED RESOLUTION.

Whereas (here state the subject matter or thing to be investigated, the power under which Congress acts, and the purpose of the investigation).

Resolved, etc. (This clause should authorize the appointment of a committee; authorize and direct such committee to inquire into and investigate the subject described, and require it to report. Provisions with reference to compelling the giving of testimony and the production of documents, papers, etc., should be included, substantially as follows:)

For the purposes of this investigation the committee shall have power to administer oaths and to require, by subpœna, the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of all books, papers, tariffs, contracts, agreements, and documents relating to any matter under investigation.

Such attendance of witnesses and the production of such documentary evidence may be required from any place in the United States at any designated place of hearing. And, in case of disobedience to a subpœna the committee may invoke the aid of any court of the United States in requiring the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of books, papers, and documents under the provisions of this section.

And any of the circuit courts of the United States within the jurisdiction of which such inquiry is carried on may, in case of contumacy or refusal to obey a subpœna issued to any person, issue an order requiring such person to appear before said committee (and produce books and papers if so ordered) and give evidence touching the matter in question; and any failure to obey such order of the court may be punished by such court as a contempt thereof.

No person shall be excused from attending and testifying or from producing books, papers, tariffs, contracts, agreements, and documents before the committee, or in obedience to the subpœna of the committee, whether such subpœna be signed or issued by one or more of the members of such committee, on the ground or for the reason that the testimony or evidence, documentary or otherwise, required of him may tend to criminate him or subject him to a penalty or forfeiture. But no person shall be prosecuted or subjected to any penalty or forfeiture for or on account of any transaction, matter, or thing concerning which he may testify, or produce evidence, documentary or otherwise, before such committee, or in obedience to its subpœna, or the subpœna of any member thereof: Provided, That no person so testifying shall be exempt from prosecution and punishment for perjury committed in so testifying.

Any person who shall neglect or refuse to attend and testify, or to answer any lawful inquiry, or to produce books, papers, tariffs, contracts, agreements, and documents, if in his power to do so, in obedience to the subpœna or lawful requirement of the committee shall be guilty of an offense, and, upon conviction thereof by a court of competent jurisdiction, shall be punished by fine not less than $100 nor more than $5,000.

QUERY.

How would it do to pass a bill providing immunity for witnesses testifying before a committee of either House when that House has provided by resolution for the investigation and for immunity to witnesses?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK].

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire any time.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Then I will yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY].

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, in connection with this resolution, I was very much interested by the remarks of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN] in defense and laudation of the United States Steel Trust. I caught the force of one of his initial remarks, that legislation in this country ought not to force ruinous competition, and I concur with him in that proposition. I believe that experience will demonstrate that the great difficulty in this country is not from legislation in forcing ruinous competition, but from legislation permitting ruinous competition. [Applause on the Democratic side.] But the gentleman's idea of ruinous competition and mine are evidently as opposite as the poles. By ruinous competition I mean a system under which a powerful organization can combine the resources of an industry into a single grasp, and by ruinous, cutthroat methods put down every effort to compete with it. I believe that by permitting immense combinations to lower their prices in one locality while they raise them in another place, in order that while lowering prices in one place and throttling competition there they may compensate themselves by higher prices at another place or other places, that that is ruinous competition which legislation ought to forbid and ought to prohibit. I believe that when an organization like the Steel Trust or the Standard Oil may so combine its energies and direct its operations that, for instance, an independent refining company attempting to sell oil in opposition to the Standard at Fort Worth, Tex., might be throttled by lower prices at Fort Worth, while the same company—the Standard—may raise its prices at Dallas or at Houston or San Antonio or New Orleans to recoup itself for the losses sustained at Fort Worth, thereby maintaining an average at which they can make a great profit. I believe that that is ruinous and cutthroat competition, capable of being indulged in only by the great corporations and combinations, and against which the smaller industries and independent producers and the general consumer ought to be protected by proper legislation. By such ruinous competition combination builds itself into monopoly and oppresses without limit both producer and consumer. [Applause.]

Furthermore, I believe that when a manufacturer of home products so enlarges his grasp upon an industry that he can, as Mr. Carnegie said, dictate to every manufacturer of like products the prices at which he shall put his products upon the market for fear a cutthroat war might be waged against him, we have reached a condition where the legislation of the country should interfere for the protection of the weaker. I heard a motto once when I was a boy at school given by a young college boy. The motto was, "Protect the weak, defend the right, and woman's honor shield." It appealed to the chivalrous spirit, but we have reached a position now when it seems to me we should reverse that saying and leave the first clause to be the climax, to be the greatest, "Protect the weak"; it carries all the rest. And when I hear men in the halls of Congress representing the great masses of the American people pleading for the right of immense combinations and corporations which throttle and destroy all competition under the guise of benefit to the American workingman, it seems to me we have reached a point where a renovation of our thoughts and our ideals is necessary. We have heard the cry of protection to the American workingman raised in defense of corporations that import foreign so-called pauper labor and drive out our American workingman till I am tired of it. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The very Steel Trust so eloquently praised by the gentleman from Tennessee, as I am informed, has a great majority of its laborers imported, and many of them can not speak English. We need to be represented here by Representatives who speak for the masses and not for the classes, men who speak for the millions of consumers and not for the petty few of the petted industries. [Applause on the Democratic side.] It seems to me that that is right, and I want to warn Members on our side, and the other side, too, that they will never reach a remedy until they provide a law that will prevent cutthroat, ruinous competition. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM].

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Speaker, I have no doubt this resolution ought to pass, although it seems to me that some of the language of it is broader than perhaps it ought to be. That, however, is a matter which can be pointed out as we go along. I can not yield my assent to the position taken by the gentleman from Tennessee. It occurs to me that is rather a severe commentary on the management of public affairs when in this country, with its enormous resources, we brag because workingmen have a full dinner pail. It has always seemed to me to be the most insulting proposition that could be put forth. With the sparcity of population we have, with the enormous amount of productive land, with exhaustless mineral resources and natural advantages we have, it is strange that any party or any person should make it a cause for bragging that the workingmen of America get enough to eat. We hear a great deal—and possibly a great deal too much—about the prosperity that we enjoy, but that prosperity is not distributed, I think, as it ought to be. A prosperity improperly placed, improperly distributed, may be, and many think it is, one of the greatest menaces to our Government to-day. Wealth is power, and those who have the wealth by some means or other will manage to exercise that power. Is it prosperity of which we ought to be proud that so much wealth of the country should be placed in the hands of a few of its people and so very much of it under the control of these enormous corporations? I asked for time now merely for the purpose of reading into the RECORD a statement which is quoted from a book recently published by Prof. Gilbert Holland Montague, of the department of economics of Harvard University, which bears directly upon the organization of this very corporation. If Mr. Montague is right about it, its organization ought to be a subject for investigation. He says:

How remote is the bearing which the cash value of the plants has upon the capitalization of the trust is strikingly shown in the United States Steel Corporation. In exchange for the stock of its constituent companies, this trust gave of its own stock an equivalent amount and $74,373,035 more. At the formation of these concerns, however, there had been a capitalization in excess of cash value. The properties composing the American Tin Plate Co., which represented a cash value of $18,000,000, were capitalized at $46,000,000. The National Steel Co., valued at $27,000,000, was capitalized at $59,000,000. The American Steel Hoop Co., representing a money investment of $14,000,000, was capitalized at $33,000,000. The capitalization of the Federal Steel Co., fixed at $98,000,000, on the admission of its president, exceeded by $31,000,000 the value of its separate concerns. The properties of the American Steel & Wire Co., capitalized at $80,000,000, on Mr. Morgan's estimate in 1898, were valued at $40,000,000. From the testimony of the officers themselves it appears that the cash value of the plants entering the United States Steel Corporation—estimating the National Tube Co. on the same basis as the American Tin Plate Co.—was $278,570,200, and the "good will," $178,500,000. Since the United States Steel Corporation increased this capitalization by $74,373,035, $252,873,035 of its capital stock appears to be based on intangible assets.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave that my time be extended.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent——

Mr. HENRY of Texas. To extend his remarks. I have not further time.

Mr. GRAHAM. I would like to ask unanimous consent to finish reading the statement. There are but two short paragraphs.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. How long would it take?

Mr. GRAHAM. About three minutes.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Then, Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for three minutes more.

Mr. GRAHAM. He continues:

Still another comparison is that made by the United States Steel Corporation itself in purchasing the shares of the different companies. The common stock of all the constituent companies, excluding the Carnegie Co. and the Lake Superior Consolidated Mines, which have no preferred stock, amounts to $270,835,100. As the common stock added by the United States Steel Corporation represents "good will," the total excess over the money invested in the plants is $302,118,963.

The most striking comparison, finally, is afforded by the easy test of the investment market. The par value of the securities of the United States Steel Corporation before the conversion of its preferred stock into bonds was $1,404,000,000, $550,000,000 of which was 7 per cent cumulative preferred stock and $304,000,000 5 per cent gold bonds. The bonds have since sold at about 72, the preferred stock has fluctuated about 54, and the common stock has fallen to 10. In the opinion of the stock market, the proper capitalization of the United States Steel Corporation is about $570,880,000 and the overcapitalization is about $833,120,000, or nearly 60 per cent.

This statement means that one-third of it is actual capital and two-thirds, substantially speaking, is "water." And yet the law, as it stands on the statute books to-day, is based on the theory that this concern shall have the right to overcharge the American people for what it produces to such an extent that it shall earn a very large per cent of profit not only on the real capital invested, but also on the water that is pumped into that capital. I say, where that condition exists, if it is capitalized at a billion and a half dollars, when it should be capitalized at only one-third of that amount, it ought to be investigated, and I hope it will be. [Applause.]

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, this resolution of the gentleman from Kentucky to investigate the Steel Trust comes before the House at a peculiarly opportune time. Yesterday the highest tribunal in this country rendered a decision of the most far-reaching importance, a decision directly affecting the whole industrial fight against these trusts and combinations.

I listened to the opinion of the learned Chief Justice affirming, in substance, the opinion of the circuit court of appeals at St. Louis, deciding that the Standard Oil Co. was guilty of a violation of the Sherman antitrust law. I also listened to a separate opinion of Mr. Justice Harlan concurring in the finding of the court, but pointing out that the use of the word "reasonable," in deciding that the Standard Oil Co.'s acts had been an unreasonable restraint of trade, was finally introducing into the Sherman Antitrust Act a word that the trusts and corporations had for 15 years been trying in vain to write in there.

If that be the effect of the decision; if there is to be, as the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN] seems to feel—and I unqualifiedly disagree with him—a distinction between good trusts and bad trusts, it is time for us to know it right now.

There is no desire on the part of the Democratic majority in this House to tear down a single business institution under the Stars and Stripes—not one. [Applause.] But there is an earnest and sincere desire to see that every business man, big and little, gets an equal opportunity to promote trade and not to restrict it.

No better way can be found for introducing remedial legislation than a full, fair, and free investigation into the facts upon which that legislation must be based. Those who contend that the word "unreasonable" ought not to be in the Sherman Antitrust Act, lay their stress on the words "restraint of trade." It is every contract in restraint of trade is to be prohibited. It is not every contract that a business man may make, as has been speciously contended by the trust lawyers, but every contract in restraint of trade among the States that is declared unlawful. But if you qualify the restraint of trade with reasonable or unreasonable or any other word which leaves it doubtful, then it becomes a question for broad, limitless construction as to which are good trusts and which are bad trusts. This has been the feeling among many men of progressive tendencies who desire to see the interests of the business men protected; who desire not to see a tearing down of trade, but a promotion of trade through individual effort, and by all men willing to embark their enterprise, energy, and capital in competition for the development of the resources of the country.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. If I have time.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Has the gentleman seen the full text of the opinion so as to be able to give to the House his opinion whether it is in fact liberalizing the common law as to reasonable or unreasonable restraint of trade?

Mr. BORLAND. I only heard the oral opinion. I heard both oral opinions, and, in my judgment, Justice Harlan's criticism was well founded. It seems to me that the majority opinion is capable of introducing a vague expression into the law which the trans-Missouri and the Traffic Association cases had rejected. That being so, this resolution to investigate the Steel Trust comes at an opportune time. The country is now facing a crisis in its legislative history. It must determine whether it has the power to control these trusts; whether there be any distinction between good trusts and bad trusts, and whether it be within the power of Congress to promote the interests of the Government and the interests of commerce by securing to the big business man and the little business man the same equal opportunity in the development of American trade and the American markets. [Applause.]

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I was about to yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY], but he does not seem to be present. I therefore move the previous question on the resolution and amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, what amendment is that?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. It is one amendment adding the letter "s" to the word "relation"—a typographical error.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the previous question on the resolution and amendment.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 12, page 2, add the letter "s" to the word "relation."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. HENRY of Texas, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

NEW MEXICO AND ARIZONA.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the House joint resolution 14, approving the constitutions of New Mexico and Arizona as amended. Pending that motion, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time for general debate be equally divided between the two sides, one half to be controlled by myself and the other half by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. LANGHAM].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of House joint resolution 14, looking to the admission of Arizona and New Mexico as States. Pending that he requests that general debate be equally divided between the two sides, to be controlled one half by himself and the other half by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. LANGHAM].

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I will not ask that any limitation be placed on general debate at this time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of House joint resolution 14, with Mr. GARRETT in the chair.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the joint resolution be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the report of the committee be read in my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the report in the time of the gentleman from Virginia.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on the Territories, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 14) approving the constitutions formed by the constitutional conventions of the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona, having had the same under consideration, reports it back with a substitute and with the recommendation that the substitute do pass.

The act "To enable the people of New Mexico to form a constitution and State government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States; and to enable the people of Arizona to form a constitution and State government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States," approved June 20, 1910, provided that when the constitutions for the proposed States of New Mexico and Arizona therein provided for should be formed in accordance with the terms and conditions of said enabling act, and said constitutions so framed should have been ratified by the people of New Mexico and Arizona, respectively, at elections provided for in said enabling act, certified copies thereof should be submitted to the President of the United States and to Congress for approval, and that if Congress and the President should approve the constitutions, or if the President should approve said constitutions and Congress should fail to disapprove the same during the next regular session of Congress, then, and in that event, the President should certify the fact to the governors of New Mexico and Arizona, respectively, who should, within 30 days thereafter, issue proclamations for the election of State and county officers and other officers of said proposed States, as therein set forth.

The committee reports that constitutions have been framed by constitutional conventions in accordance with the terms and conditions of said enabling act, and have been duly ratified by the people of New Mexico and Arizona, respectively, at elections held for that purpose, and that certified copies thereof have been duly submitted to Congress and to the President of the United States for approval, in accordance with the terms of said enabling act.

The committee further reports that on February 24, 1911, the President approved the said constitution of New Mexico in a message to the Congress as follows:

"To the Senate and House of Representatives:

"The act to enable the people of New Mexico to form a constitution and State government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, etc., passed June 20, 1910, provides that when the constitution, for the adoption of which provision is made in the act, shall have been duly ratified by the people of New Mexico in the manner provided in the statute, a certified copy of the same will be submitted to the President of the United States and to Congress for approval, and that if Congress and the President approve of such constitution, or if the President approve the same and Congress fails to disapprove the same during the next regular session thereof, then that the President shall certify said facts to the governor of New Mexico, who shall proceed to issue his proclamation for the election of State and county officers, etc.

"The constitution prepared in accordance with the act of Congress has been duly ratified by the people of New Mexico, and a certified copy of the same has been submitted to me and also to the Congress for approval, in conformity with the provisions of the act. Inasmuch as the enabling act requires affirmative action by the President, I transmit herewith a copy of the constitution, which, I am advised, has also been separately submitted to Congress, according to the provisions of the act, by the authorities of New Mexico, and to which I have given my formal approval.

"I recommend the approval of the same by the Congress.

"WM. H. TAFT.

"THE WHITE HOUSE, February 24, 1911."

The President so far has not acted on the said constitution of Arizona.

The committee further reports that it has had said constitutions under consideration and finds the same to be republican in form; that they make no distinction in civil or political rights on account of race or color, and that they are not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States or the Declaration of Independence, and that they are in conformity with the provisions of the enabling act.

The committee further reports that on February 16, 1911, Congress passed and the President approved a joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution reaffirming the boundary line between Texas and the Territory of New Mexico," defining the boundary line between the proposed State of New Mexico and the State of Texas, which boundary as defined in said resolution is not the boundary as defined in said constitution, and said joint resolution was passed to correct and define said boundary line and declared that any provision of said constitution that in any way tends to annul or change the boundary line defined in said joint resolution should be of no force or effect, but should be so construed as not in any way to change, affect, or alter said boundary lines defined in said joint resolution, and that the boundary line defined in said joint resolution "should be held and declared a conclusive location and settlement of said boundary lines."

The committee has carefully considered the said resolution so referred to it, and has had a number of meetings, at which citizens from the two Territories, particularly New Mexico, have appeared and been heard; representatives of the Anti-Saloon League and the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of New Mexico were also heard.

The committee also had before it the report of the hearings and evidence produced before the same committee of the Sixty-first Congress on this question.

The substitute admits both of the Territories as States without approving the constitution of either; in fact, changes in both constitutions are suggested by the substitute, which in effect is a disapproval of both constitutions as adopted.

This has been done in order to meet the views of those Members of Congress who are willing to admit these Territories as States but who are averse to affirmatively approving their constitutions as adopted.

In the case of New Mexico the suggested change is in Article XIX of its proposed constitution, which is the article on amendments. The reason for submitting this suggested change is that this article, as contained in the proposed constitution, taken in connection with the apportionment for the members of the legislature, renders it extremely difficult, if not impossible, to amend this constitution.

Article XIX as adopted requires that amendments may be proposed by two-thirds of all the members elected to each house of the legislature, except that at the first regular session held after the expiration of two years, and every eight years thereafter, a majority can propose amendments; but in either case only three amendments can be submitted at one election, and this must be a general election, and all amendments must be ratified by a majority of the electors voting thereon, and this majority must equal 40 per cent of all of the votes cast for any purpose and 40 per cent of the vote cast in at least one-half of the counties of the State. The question of calling a constitutional convention can not be submitted to a vote of the people until the expiration of 25 years except by a three-fourths vote of all the members elected to each house of the legislature, and to call a convention during that period there must not only be a majority of all the electors voting at the election, but there must also be a majority of all the electors voting in one-half of the counties.

From a consideration of these provisions it will be seen that it will be extremely difficult for the people of New Mexico to secure the holding of a constitutional convention during the first 25 years, and when these provisions are considered in connection with the apportionment for members of the legislature provided by the constitution, the extreme difficulty of amending the constitution in any way will be manifest. By reference to the apportionment, it will be found that the four counties of Colfax, San Miguel, Bernalillo, and Socorro, with an aggregate population of 77,000, and which, on the basis adopted by the constitutional convention for representatives in the senate, would entitle this population to between 5 and 6 senators, are so apportioned that they constitute parts of 10 senatorial districts and can control the election of 10 of the 24 senators, and thus prevent the securing of two-thirds of the senators necessary to submit to the people an amendment to the constitution.

Then it will be further seen that if under such conditions an amendment is submitted to the people the constitution makes it extremely difficult to secure the necessary vote for its adoption. To adopt such an amendment a majority of the electors voting on the amendment must of course vote for it, and in addition this majority must consist of 40 per cent of the vote cast on all questions and 40 per cent of the vote cast in one-half of the counties. Thus it will be seen that if an amendment is submitted at a general election at which 25,000 votes are cast but only 10,000 votes cast upon the amendment, 9,000 of which are in favor of it and 1,000 against it, the amendment would be lost, because 40 per cent of all the votes cast at the election were not cast for the amendment. Or, again, if the amendment was popular in 12 of the 26 counties and unpopular in the other 14, 15,000 votes might be cast for it and none against it in the 12 counties, and 3,500 votes for it in the other 14 counties and 6,500 against it, and yet an amendment upon which there might have been 18,500 votes cast for and 6,500 votes against would be lost. It is only necessary to call attention to such provisions to secure their condemnation.

It is moreover found that the population of the counties lying along the eastern border of New Mexico have increased very rapidly in population in the past decade and will probably increase more rapidly in the future. The apportionment provided in the constitution suggests the denial of adequate representation to the rapidly increasing population of that section for a long time, unless the constitution is made more easy of amendment.

Certain other provisions of the constitution as framed and adopted are very objectionable, and will in their operation be very oppressive to the people of the new State, and it is claimed that they were brought about at the instigation and in the interest of certain large corporations and special interests whom it is claimed exerted large influence in the framing of the proposed constitution. The committee, however, has not thought fit to undertake to correct such objectionable features because it did not feel that it was in the province of Congress to make a constitution for the proposed State.

The substitute resolution suggests an amendment to the proposed constitution of New Mexico, providing that any amendments may be proposed at any regular session by a majority of all the members elected to the legislature, and that the same shall be submitted to the electors for ratification or rejection at the next general election or at a special election, and if ratified by a majority of the electors voting thereon such amendment or amendments shall become a part of the constitution, thus putting it in the power of the people of the new State to amend their constitution if desirable to correct or eliminate any provisions thereof that may be found to be objectionable or oppressive.

The constitution also attempts to secure the original Mexican or Spanish-American population of New Mexico in their equal right of suffrage and in the enjoyment of equal rights of education with other citizens, present and prospective, of the New State. Your committee has not only by its proposed amendment of said Article XIX preserved such rights as are secured in the proposed constitution, but has made sections 1 and 3 of Article VII, on the elective franchise, and sections 8 and 10 of Article XII, on education, more secure against amendment than is provided in said proposed constitution. This was done to make clearer and more certain what seemed to be the unanimous wish of the people of New Mexico.

It will be noted that the amendment suggested in the substitute is not made mandatory, but is to be submitted to the electors for ratification or rejection, as a majority may determine.

It has been represented to the committee, and is no doubt true, that the people of the Territory were so desirous of securing statehood that when the proposed constitution was submitted its merits and demerits were not carefully considered, but, being submitted to them, as it was, as a whole, a large majority, through their great desire to secure statehood, voted for it without regard to what is provisions were. The amendment suggested by the substitute resolution reported by the committee, if adopted, will give the people of the Territory the power and opportunity which they otherwise would not have—to change any provision which in their desire for statehood may not have been sufficiently considered when the proposed constitution was ratified.

It will be seen from section 4 of the substitute resolution that provision is made for a separate ballot for the purpose of voting upon such amendment, which is to be printed on paper of a blue tint so as to be readily distinguishable from the white ballots which will be used for the election of officers at the same election, and that these ballots are to be delivered only to the election officers and to be delivered by them to the individual voter when he offers to vote.

These provisions were made because the election is in other respects to be held under and subject to the election laws of New Mexico now in force, which do not provide for a secret ballot, and under which ballots are required to be "printed on plain white paper 3 inches in width and 8 inches in length or within one-quarter of an inch of that size." (Compiled Laws of New Mexico, 1897, sec. 1634.) And said ballots are to have the names of all candidates for the respective offices printed thereon, and if the suggested amendments were required also to be printed on these ballots, it is obvious that there would not be room for that purpose, and besides, under the present election laws of the Territory, the ballots can be distributed indiscriminately among the people some time before the day of election, and in other respects these election laws are lacking in the usual safeguards, while the provisions made by the substitute resolution in reference to the separate constitutional ballots will guarantee the necessary and usual safeguards.

The committee has also provided in said proposed substitute that the enabling act of June 20, 1910, shall be amended by making section 5 of said act so read as to remove the disqualification imposed upon the Spanish-American population of New Mexico who can not read, write, and speak the English language for holding State offices, including membership in the legislature of the new State. No just reason is found for such disqualification.

The evidence before the committee was that these Spanish-American citizens are eager for education and largely now speak the English language, and strive to advance the teaching of English to their children in all of their public schools, but that this provision of the enabling act is regarded by them as a reflection upon them and their race. They have at all times supported by their votes and the imposition of taxes the developing of the public-school system of New Mexico. They are largely an agricultural people, frugal, industrious, and earnest supporters of every movement intended to advance the progress, prosperity, and civilization of New Mexico.

Again, it was suggested that this disqualification violates the spirit and the letter of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo between the United States and the Republic of Mexico, entered into on the 2d day of February, 1848, by the terms of which the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona were for the most part acquired.

The said treaty above mentioned, after providing in article 8 thereof that such citizens of the Republic of Mexico prior to said treaty as manifested their desire to become citizens of the United States by remaining in such ceded territory for a period of one year, proceeds in article 9 thereof as follows:

"Mexicans who in the territory aforesaid shall not preserve the character of citizens of the Mexican Republic, conformably with what is stipulated in the preceding article, shall be incorporated into the Union of the United States, and be admitted at the proper time (to be judged of by the Congress of the United States) to the enjoyment of all the rights of citizens of the United States, according to the principles of the Constitution; and in the meantime shall be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty and property and secured in the free exercise of their religion without restriction."

It is doubted if the guaranty in Article IX to the previous citizens of the Republic of Mexico to be admitted * * * "to the enjoyment of all the rights of citizens of the United States, according to the principles of the Constitution" is properly observed or enforced by said section 5 of the enabling act, when such citizens are denied the right to hold office, as aforesaid, unless they can read, write, and speak the English language. No such language restriction is found in the Constitution of the United States, and the committee believes that part of the enabling act containing such provision should be repealed.

The committee has also in its substitute resolution suggested an amendment to the proposed constitution of Arizona providing that the judiciary of the new State shall not be subject to recall from office by popular vote.

This amendment is not made mandatory, but is merely proposed and is to be submitted to the electors for their ratification or rejection at the first general election for State and county officers.

The controlling reason of the committee for proposing this change was the objection of the President of the United States to the recall provision of the Arizona constitution so far as it applies to the judiciary, and the belief on the part of the committee that if the recall as applied to the judiciary was again submitted to the people of Arizona it would meet the objection of the President.

The committee did not provide a separate ballot for voting on the proposed amendment to the Arizona constitution as it did in the case of New Mexico for the reason that Arizona has an effective and modern Australian election law, under which there is no restriction on the size or shape of the ballots, and the election on this amendment will be held under and subject to that election law, except so far as said law requires an educational qualification as a prerequisite to the right to vote. This exception was made in order to protect the Spanish-American electors of Arizona in the right to vote on this amendment.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I fear that I appreciate the responsibility more than the unexpected honor of opening the discussion on this resolution admitting the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona to statehood, and I regret that I have not the exhaustive knowledge of Territorial affairs which might be expected on the part of one to whom that honor is assigned.

Perhaps, with the exception of the tariff and ship subsidies, the oldest issue in American politics is the admission of New Mexico to statehood, and Arizona has been knocking for admission now for more than 20 years. It might be assumed that all of the issues involved had been threshed out and argument exhausted; and particularly, perhaps, may this be contended with reference to the Territory of New Mexico, whose constitution has been approved by the President, and the resolution to approve which and admit New Mexico to statehood passed the House of Representatives during the last session without opposition or dissent. But since that action by the House, which failed of concurrence in the other body, the situation has been entirely changed by the appearance of the constitution of the Territory of Arizona and its joinder with the constitution of New Mexico in the procedure of approval.

I voted in the last House in good faith for the admission of New Mexico and without regard, I may say, to any of the various features of its constitution. It would be pleasant if I could say that I acted in the belief that a like good faith would be shown to the Territory of Arizona and that the people of that Territory, having framed and adopted by nearly an 80 per cent vote their organic law, it, too, would be approved by the President and by Congress without subjecting the various features of its constitution not to a constitutional, but to a political, scrutiny.

But, unfortunately for me, the RECORD will show that I did not act upon the New Mexico constitution in the belief that the Territory of Arizona would be as liberally dealt with, and unfortunately for the Territory of Arizona subsequent events have established the fact that it has not been thus liberally dealt with. I therefore have no apologies to offer for the fact that while I unqualifiedly voted for the admission of New Mexico during the last Congress I am, in this Congress, proposing to attach a condition precedent thereto; and in this discussion I shall give no weight whatever to the action of this House and my action in connection therewith in the last Congress when one of these constitutions alone was before this Congress, now that they have come jointly before us and there is some disposition, if not an expressed intention, in certain quarters to make fish of one and flesh of the other——

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I will.

Mr. MONDELL. Did I understand the gentleman to say that his attitude toward New Mexico at this time is due to what he has termed the treatment accorded to Arizona since he voted without qualification for the admission of New Mexico? Did I rightly understand that to be the gentleman's position?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. My position at this time, I will say to the gentleman from Wyoming, is to insure as far as possible the admission upon equal terms and at the same time of both of those Territories.

Mr. MONDELL. Then the gentleman's position is, if there was no question about the admission of Arizona, he would not be inclined to insist upon any conditions in regard to the admission of New Mexico?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Well, I think the gentleman knows as well as I do, and I propose to go into that subject somewhat during the course of my remarks, that there is some disposition to question the admission of Arizona at this time, and I need only call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the constitution of Arizona has been in the possession of the President without his approval since prior to the adjournment of the last Congress, while the constitution of New Mexico was very promptly approved——

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. May I ask the gentleman how long before the adjournment of the last Congress that constitution reached the hands of the President?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Well, I am not claiming it reached his hands a very long period of time before——

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. The vote was taken February 19 for ratification, was it not?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. February 9.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. February 9. I simply want to know, I have no——

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. The vote was taken for New Mexico January 21.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I understand when those votes were taken, but I wanted to know of the gentleman from Colorado if he knew when the Arizona constitution reached the hands of the President?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I will say to the gentleman that for my present purpose the exact date is not material. The material thing is that it reached the hands of the President on some day prior to the adjournment of the last Congress. Conceding, for the sake of argument, it was on the very last day, it has remained in his hands ever since without action.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Does the gentleman even know it reached the hands of the President on the last day of the last session?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I understand it reached the hands of the President as soon as it did the Congress.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Does the gentleman know when it reached the Congress?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. It reached that body in time for the question of the approval of the constitution of Arizona to be attached to a resolution to approve that of New Mexico——

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. When was that?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado (continuing). And it was attached in the Senate and thereafter the resolution was voted down.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Was that after midnight of March 3?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Well, I did not hold the watch on the deliberations of the other body.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. It was simply in the interest of getting the facts straight that I wanted to inquire of the gentleman; that was all.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I think, Mr. Chairman, I make the facts sufficiently straight when I say that now for two months and a half the constitution of the Territory of Arizona has been in the possession of the President of the United States without any action by him thereon, whereas, on the other hand, he very promptly approved the constitution of New Mexico. That ought to be plain enough for the gentleman.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Colorado yield to the gentleman from California?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I do.

Mr. RAKER. Has the gentleman from Colorado, or has the committee, any information to the effect that the President will not approve the constitution of Arizona for any cause, and if he will not approve it, is there any special reason why he will not?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I want to say, in answer to the gentleman, that it has not been my privilege to discuss this matter with the President. I understand some members of the committee have discussed it with him, and that they know his attitude, if it could be known, which I think is a rather doubtful proposition.

Aside from that, all I know about it is what the gentleman and others know about it from the discussion of the subject in the public press. I presume the Members here have all read in the last two days the President's bitter and unqualified denunciation of one of the provisions of the Arizona constitution. I think it may be safely assumed when the President of the United States goes all over the land making speeches directed against the provisions of a constitution which is now in his hands, and when he warned the people against adopting it, that it is at least a matter of doubt whether he will approve that constitution unless some such proposition as we have suggested to this House shall be adopted.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I want the gentleman from Colorado to understand that I do not want to interrupt him unless he is perfectly willing. This inquiry is not for the purpose in any way of embarrassing the gentleman in anything he may say. My understanding is—and I want to find out how far that coincides with the gentleman's understanding—that the President has openly declared that he will not approve the Arizona constitution with the provision in it permitting the recall of judges? Is that the gentleman's understanding?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I do not understand that the President has ever made any such open and unqualified statement as the gentleman has repeated.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I understand that is his objection. Does the gentleman from Colorado understand that?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I understand that his principal objection is the recall of the judiciary.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. The recall of judges.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. That is what I understand to be the ground of the President's objection.

I have no objection to interruptions, provided I have time to finish my speech. I have not proceeded very far, and yet in the little distance I have gone I have traveled over several sections of my speech already.

CONSTITUTIONS PRESENT GREATEST ISSUE SINCE SLAVERY.

I may say at the outset that these constitutions are typical of the two great contending schools of political thought now struggling for the mastery in this country, and whose conflicting ideas are fast becoming national issues, that of New Mexico being reactionary, as we call it—some people call it conservative—to a marked degree, and that of Arizona being progressive—some people call it radical—to a degree no less marked. And coming jointly before Congress at this time and under these conditions they are bound to excite, and have already excited, a discussion perhaps never before attending the admission of States, with the exception of the controversy over the admission of States involving the question of the extension of chattel slavery.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Kansas and Nebraska, for example.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Exactly; Kansas and Nebraska, as the gentleman says.

Mr. Chairman, I take a deep interest in the admission of the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona. They are entitled to it. It is their birthright. And let those who are opposed to the imposition of any further condition precedent to the admission of these Territories bear in mind that it was not because of any fear or any probability that these Territories would not adopt constitutions republican in form that they have been thus long denied the rights and privileges of statehood. For more than 35 years now the Territory of New Mexico has been upon the verge of statehood. She has been during all of that time qualified for statehood. She has been during all of that time entitled to statehood. And the fact that she has been, under one pretext or another, denied statehood, but never under the pretext that she would not adopt a republican form of constitution, is sufficient in itself to demonstrate that other considerations have barred her progress to the highest ambition and goal of all Territories.

Then, as a neighbor, and knowing the tower of strength they will be to the band of sister Western States in Congress, regardless of politics, I am deeply interested in the admission of New Mexico and Arizona, and I would be the last man on this committee to do any act or advise any course that I thought would materially delay or threaten the consummation of statehood. Nor is any material delay involved in the recommendations of the committee. On the contrary, indications are not wanting that acquiescence in the action of the committee will promote and expedite statehood. Before proceeding to consider these recommendations and the cause of them, I want to further notice some preliminary matters which I have already touched upon, but from which I have been diverted by interruption.

This is a Government by political parties, and I take no stock in the protestations of men who disclaim political considerations, a position I may safely take when dealing with one proposed State which failed of admission to the Union 35 years ago because of political considerations, and with another whose admission is now threatened solely because of differences of political opinion. And yet I shall undertake to show that the committee has dealt with absolute impartiality with reference to both of these proposed States; that it proposes to submit to each of them but one proposition, to be voted upon at the time of the first election of State officers, leaving the peoples of the proposed States absolutely free to vote these propositions up or down; only that they shall be required to vote upon them.

TERRITORIES EQUALLY ENTITLED TO ADMISSION.

Under the enabling act passed at the second session of the last Congress the constitution of New Mexico was submitted to the President and Congress during the closing days of the last session for their action, as provided in the enabling act. The President, as I have already stated, very promptly approved of the constitution of New Mexico, but has thus far failed to approve of the constitution of Arizona, which he can not claim, which he has not claimed, and which can not seriously be claimed to be unrepublican or violative of the principles of the Declaration of Independence or of the Federal Constitution.

The House of Representatives, as I have already stated, approved the constitution of New Mexico, at the time of taking which action I said in the House I would be glad, in view of the threatened disapproval of the constitution of Arizona, if, when it came to admitting these proposed States—and here is my answer to the gentleman from Wyoming—we could tie them together and make it both or neither, because, as I take it, their rights in the premises are absolutely equal. I, for one, now that this joinder has been brought about by circumstances over which I have no control, say that I am absolutely unwilling that one shall come into the Union and the other shall be barred.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I will.

Mr. MONDELL. I understand the gentleman to answer my question by stating that his objections to the unqualified admission of New Mexico is that Arizona shall be admitted without any conditions?
